

Make Your Words Sell!

The Simple Art of Persuasion

by Ken Evoy & Joe Robson

Look at any website or blog.

Take away the words. Could it sell without the words?

Nope.

Now take away the graphics.

Could a no-graphics site sell?

Sure.

Time to focus on something that gets sales...

Words.

All you have to do now is...

Write to sell!

1. Foreword.....	4
2. Why Most Web Copy Fails.....	6
3. Prep, Prep, and More Prep.....	16
4. Copywriting 101 – Getting the Basics Right	30
5. Copywriting 102 – More Than Just Words.....	44
6. Write to Fit the Big Picture.....	61
7. Thrive or Dive With Your USP	76
8. The Power of Headlines	85
9. How to Read a Mindset.....	105
10. Let’s Use Your New Skills!.....	114
11. Well? Don’t Just Sit There!	171
12. The 5 Copy Keys.....	175
13. Words That Trigger an Automatic Response	177

1. Foreword

By Ken Evoy, Founder and CEO of SiteSell Inc.

*“Words are loaded pistols.”
- Jean-Paul Sartre*

Selling software online? A service? A course? A product? If you want to sell more...

Use the right words.

Words sell, graphics don't.

Sure, graphics set the stage. After all, even written pearls can't make an amateur-looking site sell. But the right words can certainly overcome a mediocre design. And the wrong words will destroy even the most expensive, professional-looking site.

While words “rule,” online businesses continue to pour most of their dollars and time into design.” Why?

Maybe it's just too tough to write words that sell.

Perhaps it's too hard to find people who can do it.

Or could it be that most folks simply don't know how to write for the internet?

It's not difficult. I suspected that what people really lacked was a doable approach.

And so, the idea for this book was born.

I first met Joe Robson when he wrote a review article about our first book, Make Your Site Sell!. Actually, it was more than a review. It was an entire tutorial, and it was brilliant. Long story short, Joe and I teamed up to bring you Make Your Words Sell!.

Simple. Clean. Clear. Effective. Written from the ground up, created solely to show you how to persuade, Make Your Words Sell! (MYWS!) is loaded with original and powerful concepts. And here's my favorite, the core of the entire book...

SWAT?

Its original “SWAT? it to death” method guarantees that your copy will sell. “SWAT?” virtually forces you to pull the strongest sales-getting benefits out of your product / service and onto your visitor's screen. Study and use it. If you do, your sales copy will almost write itself.

And really, that's all there is to it. You already know how to persuade people. This book shows you how to do it on the Internet. In other words, it shows you how to...

Make Your Words Sell!

Wishing you outstanding sales,

Ken Evoy

P.S. Don't even begin to think in your head... "I'm not a writer." Hemingway was a writer. You don't need to be. MYWS! does not turn you into a writer, just an effective persuader.

2. Why Most Web Copy Fails

“Words are, of course, the most powerful drug used by mankind.”

– Rudyard Kipling

Did you ever see a headline that absolutely demands attention? One that shouts, “Hey look, this is for you”? Or even one that quietly seduces you with an irresistible promise?

And have you ever read a “how-to” article on writing sales copy and thought, “Yeah that makes sense. Now I know how to do it!”

It’s time for the honesty bit. Have you also suffered the frustrating reality of not being able to write the same kind of persuasive sales copy to match your business?

And have you ever tried writing web copy using similar words and phrases you’ve read in someone else’s successful copy? Only to suffer the pain and disappointment of watching your sales results refuse to improve?

How many times have you shaken your head in despair, desperately wondering what to try next? Agonizing, isn’t it? In fact, it’s enough to make a grown man weep!

You can see what others have done (<https://case-studies.sitesell.com>). You think you “get it.” But when you come to put pen to paper (or finger to keyboard) it never seems to work out quite the same.

Why is that?

After all, you know your business inside out and upside down. You have more passion about your product than any other person alive. You just know the people out there will love it.

And yet for some reason your words just downright refuse to get your excitement and passion across to your readers... at least, not enough to get them to buy. You ask yourself...

2.1. Why, Why, Why?

Why doesn’t that same passion and excitement jump out from your copy? After all, you read articles on how persuasive headlines are supposed to be written. You study examples of good web copy that seem so simply written.

You’re convinced you could do the same. And you use the “hot words” like “free,” and “now,” and “you,” which are supposed to drive customers to your order page.

So what’s wrong? Just what the heck’s going on here? Why doesn’t your copy ring the cash register?

Well, there’s something you need to understand...

You simply haven’t been shown why that piece of successful copy was written in that particular way. It may have worked brilliantly for a widget manufacturer but it would have failed miserably to impress prospects for your search engine service.

Second, you have never been shown why certain words will motivate your readers into buying. Or why other equally persuasive words are guaranteed to leave them unmoved and totally disinterested.

But most importantly, you haven’t been shown how to...

2.2. Think Like Your Customer

Please consider this carefully. It’s the key to all successful sales copy. Bar none!

When you saw that eye-catching headline that you thought would be ideal for your business, the use of those particular words and phrases may have seemed obvious to you.

But you didn’t know the thinking behind them. You didn’t realize it became successful because it appealed to a specific customer in a specifically targeted market.

And the answer to writing sales copy that will motivate your reader into buying from you is that you have to understand her mindset.

To achieve that, you have to learn to...

2.3. Dance With Your Customer

Writing successful copy is pretty much like learning to dance with a new partner. You know the right steps because you probably picked them up from someone else and managed to “get around.”

However, to create a partnership that’s beneficial to both of you, you have to discover what she wants from you. And to do that, you have to figure out how she thinks.

Until you understand how your new partner thinks, you keep making mistakes and stepping on toes. But once you learn what makes her tick, it's a whole different ballroom game. At that point, you know which moves to make to suit her specific needs and you can anticipate exactly what she wants you to do.

That's how you achieve perfect harmony. When you can anticipate her every move and understand why she wants to move that way, you understand her mindset.

Writing successful sales copy requires more than the sprinkling of a few miraculous "power words" into a detailed description of your product. Just like a dancer, you have to plan one step ahead of your reader and answer her questions and objections before they arise. You need to know how she thinks so you can inspire her with phrases that motivate her into responding the way you both want.

And once you know how to do that, you can talk to her on her level. You can identify what she really wants. You can answer her questions and solve her problem(s). By knowing which moves to make, you can guide her smoothly and carefully along the path you both wish to take to your order form.

Ken's Notes...

Joe has hit the single most important factor that separates successful online companies from failures.

While this book focuses specifically on how to write to sell, becoming your customer is vital for every aspect of e-commerce, from developing / positioning products for online sales to traffic-building to order fulfillment to customer support.

In my first book, Make Your Site SELL!, I summarize the entire book with these 6 simple rules...

1. Feel your customer's needs.
2. Make navigation clear.
3. Load fast.
4. K-I-S-S (or keep it simple).
5. Write actively and clearly.
6. Ask for "the order."

Now let's push it one step further. Re-read the words above. Think about them. The rules all spring from the first one (feel your customer's needs).

The key is to become your customer. Easy to do? Nope. You don't live in her world so it's natural to lapse back into your own viewpoint.

Many copywriters just pound out the same style over and over again. That's not good. They're writing for themselves. You'll do a better job if you become your customer. To paraphrase Vince Lombardi, your customer is not everything; she's the only thing!

The best way to make your site SELL! is to make your customer BUY!

2.4. Sales Copy Is Your Website Salesman

Consider this. What do you think makes a salesman a successful salesman? Is it because he gives his prospect lots of product information? Is it because he uses certain "hot words" like "free" that make his customers fall over themselves to order? Or is it because he's so friendly and likeable?

Well, it all helps, of course. Even average salespeople do that. No. The real reason for his success is that he's been trained to "read" his customer. He's learned how to identify exactly what she really wants. And he knows that her wants may be different to her needs.

For example, she may need a new car for reliable means of transport. However, she may really want a bright red convertible and be admired by her friends and neighbors as she polishes the gleaming bodywork in her driveway. By learning her mindset, he discovers what she really wants and skillfully provides it.

You must do the same. Learn your reader's needs and wants, employ the persuasive talents of your website salesman to talk to her on a one-to-one level, and then close the deal!

2.5. Why Is MYWS! So Unique?

It's time to explain why MYWS! is so different from any other book you might have read about Web copywriting. And I really do mean any other book!

Other books usually describe copywriting techniques that are in general use. Many of them rely heavily on analyzing past successful ads and use them as a guide to how your ads should be written.

And most of them concentrate on the mechanics of copywriting (the types of power words to use and the structure of how the sales message is put together). Therein hangs the problem!

Remember our salesman from earlier?

Imagine that he's just sold a Mercedes to the 50-year-old CEO of a company. He did it by reading his customer's mindset and learning what this man wanted... a comfortable, luxurious, executive auto that would reflect his status in the business community. Our salesman's sales pitch was successful because he offered the CEO exactly what he wanted.

Now imagine his next customer is a 25-year-old "upwardly mobile" Internet marketer who's just sold 100,000 of his latest e-book called "How to Sell 100,000 E-books on the Web." Our marketer is thinking about treating himself to a luxury car.

Do you think the salesman would use the same sales pitch as he did with the CEO? After all, it was very successful. The words were right and the motivational message was perfect.

We both know the answer.

The product is the same. The price is the same. The needs and wants of the two customers are different, though. A successful salesman offers a different appeal, or promise, to each one.

That's why an ad headline like this, "They laughed when I sat down to play the piano," might be successful for a piano course (and it was incredibly successful) but it would bomb if you were using it to sell a keyboard tutorial to 16 year olds!

Analyzing another writer's winning sales copy simply explains why it was successful after it became successful. As we all know, it's so easy to be wise after the event.

Let's change that...

2.6. The Same Customers in a Different Market

The needs and wants of your customers may well be completely different. And they might even be in a different market!

Confused? I don't blame you. In fact, I'm getting a little punch drunk myself. Let's use a simple example to clarify. Consider this successful headline for a new family sedan...

Government Research Proves the Falcon Compact Is the Safest Family Car in the World

After seeing the success of this ad, another writer uses the same headline to advertise his kitchens to the same target customer (i.e., middle-income house owners with families).

Government Research Proves That Cardinal Builds the Safest Kitchens in the World

It's the same price range, same target customer and same headline but different sales results. Why?

The ad writer for the car understood his target customer's mindset, which was determined by the market. This knowledge helped him to promise exactly what his customer wanted, which was safety for herself and her children.

The kitchen ad writer, on the other hand, didn't understand his target customer's mindset. Otherwise, he would have known that even though she needed safety in her kitchen, what she wanted was something more... maybe the envy of her friends, or the satisfaction of being a "modern" woman, and/or the thrill of spending less time toiling every day to keep her out-of-date kitchen clean and tidy.

So the kitchen ad writer made a major mistake. He made the wrong promise. Because he didn't understand what she wanted, he appealed to the wrong emotion. He simply didn't understand her mindset.

That's why MYWS! will bring you more success in your copywriting than any other book on this planet. Wanting success is your mindset -- so "your success through words" is what Ken and I set out to deliver.

Why will it succeed? Because it makes you think like your customer so you can anticipate exactly what she wants. By the time you finish reading this book, you will be sick to death of reading the word "mindset." But you will never forget it!

MYWS! shows you how to create and develop...

- your own ideas for approaches to the sale
- your own marketing concepts
- your own individual personality and style

MYWS! teaches you how to write persuasive, sales-generating headlines and copy that will motivate your specific prospects into buying from you.

It shows you how to write original sales copy, unique to your situation, rather than simply writing "second hand" copy that was carefully adapted from other writers' work. In short, you will learn how to become a successful writer of your own work.

2.7. Who's the Best Person to Write Your Copy?

You, the business owner, are the most ideal person to write sales copy for your own product or service. Only you have the detailed product knowledge, the motivation and the burning passionate desire to really get your message across to your readers.

The reality, though, is that you probably don't possess the critical writing skills to translate your passion into the written word. And the frustrating struggle to put your emotions onto your web pages somehow dilutes the message into a screen filled with uninspiring information!

"Hang on, I thought writing sales copy was about using the right words." It is, but not exclusively. Otherwise academics and creative fiction writers would be natural copywriters.

So I suppose you're now wondering, "What does passion have to do with it?" Everything! Absolutely everything.

Can you still recall the moment when you first described your online business idea to your best friend?

Weren't you excited? Wasn't your idea filled with bubbling enthusiasm and emotion? And remember how you felt when you took your first order? Boy, you thought you'd found the secret at last! Well, that's the passion I'm talking about. That's the awesome magic that compels people to buy from you.

If you could transmit that passion to your prospects through your sales copy with skillfully crafted words...

If you knew how to think like your readers and re-create that same bubbling, irresistible enthusiasm on your website...

If you only had the skill to choose the right words...

Do you think your sales would improve? You and I both know they would explode.

2.8. Shhh... Want to Know a Secret?

Most people believe there's a secret to writing successful sales copy. The secret is there is no secret! There's no mystery about writing persuasive copy.

Just as there's no mystery about the people who write it. Most of them are just ordinary folk, from ordinary backgrounds. And you thought they were gifted!

Look, we can all write, even if we're not "writers." Each one of us writes letters, memos, emails, and posts. And when you write a note to your spouse or friend? No big deal. You put your feelings onto paper without a second's thought to grammar or structure. You instinctively know which words to use to fully express yourself.

Why? Because you know that person so well, you understand how she thinks. You know exactly how she will react to the words and phrases you use. It's easy to choose words that you know will cause the specific reaction you want.

As a result, your message gets across clearly, strongly, and successfully. Without any misunderstanding, it produces the very results you wanted!

Yet if you write an email or letter to a stranger, it seems to be a whole different ball game. That's because...

2.9. You Don't Know Her

You don't know how she thinks. You have no idea how she will react to your message. So your thought processes change...

You begin struggling to convey your true feelings. Somehow, the conversation you have in your head magically dilutes itself into a formalized, stilted series of words, devoid of any strong feelings or emotions.

And it's exactly the same when writing sales copy. Unless you know how to write for your specific reader, your passion, your emotion, your sales message will alter and degenerate.

So to learn how to write truly effective and persuasive copy, you have to know what your reader is thinking. You need to...

2.10. Understand Her Mindset

That's what a really good web writer does so successfully. However, it's not enough just to think like a writer. More importantly, you have to know how to get inside your reader's mind and think like her.

Of course, you have to know how to use the right words that sell. The right words are motivating, powerful and compelling. They provide your reader with everything she really wants. Your goal is to use words that inspire and excite your reader to give you what you want.

It's this irresistible combination of words and mindset that will help you write sales copy more powerful and infinitely more effective than anything you ever thought possible.

Think that's difficult? You're in for a very sweet surprise. I assure you. It's definitely not. In fact...

2.11. Anyone Can Do It!

And I mean A-N-Y-O-N-E!

It requires no special education. No intimate knowledge of the English language. No special talent. In fact, MYWS! will show you how to write professional, successful sales copy along with the best of them.

You will soon be writing powerful, exciting and inspiring words that will turn your visitors into prospects, and your prospects into buyers. Your sales copy will motivate your buyers to buy, and buy again.

You are about to learn...

- Why certain words motivate response, and which ones to use to sell your goods and services.
- The thinking process behind the creation of powerful, attention-grabbing headlines and how to write your own.
- How to get your creative juices flowing and write motivating, order-generating sales copy that's unique to your business and appealing to your specific customers.

How are you going to achieve that? After all, you've been promised that before, haven't you? Of course, you have.

But you weren't shown the ingenious and shockingly simple copywriting technique that's in store for you here in MYWS!.

In fact, you're about to have your socks blown right off! So get ready for...

2.12. The Punch Line

MYWS! is about to show you a unique, never-seen-before copywriting technique. A technique that's so amazingly simple and yet so devastatingly effective.

This system, written especially for inexperienced web copywriters, forces you to...

1. Experience the mindset of your ideal customer and discover what she really wants.
2. Discover your USP (Unique Selling Proposition) (more on this later).
3. Reveal dozens — yes dozens — of benefits for your product. Benefits that you never even knew existed.
4. Write the most powerful and persuasive headlines specifically for your readers.

This incredibly doable, and powerful, MYWS! method also...

- Develops riveting sales copy that's absolutely saturated with benefits.
- Sets down sales copy that writes itself!
- Creates an irresistible order form that effortlessly compels your reader to buy.
- Composes the most persuasive newsletter ad you've ever written.
- And so much more.

You'll hardly believe it! In short, it's...

2.13. A Remarkably Unique Web Writing Concept

And you'll absolutely love it! But first of all, we need to discuss the essential fundamentals of writing for the Web. It's pointless trying to run before you can walk.

So hang on tight to the safety rail because I promise you you're in for an exhilarating ride! Let's do it...

The following three chapters cover the basics of copywriting. If you already know quite a bit about it, read the material quickly, just to make sure there are no holes in your knowledge. If you're new to copywriting, these chapters will bring you up to speed.

3. Prep, Prep, and More Prep

“By failing to prepare you are preparing to fail.”

-- Benjamin Franklin

There’s only one way to write web sales copy... write to sell! No ifs, buts or maybes. There’s no profit in having a product or service that almost sells!

Ken’s Notes...

Selling reminds me of this old saying... Being “close” only counts in horseshoes, hand grenades and dancing.

Almost getting the sale is just not good enough. Stay focused on one thing... get the sale.

And that’s why you’re reading MYWS!, isn’t it? To discover once and for all how you can begin writing sales messages that will grab your readers, glue them to your words, and skillfully draw them through to your order page.

And make them feel so good about you and your product that they excitedly click that magic Buy now! button.

Ken’s Notes...

I like the way Joe adds “excitedly” in the preceding sentence. Your customer should not feel manipulated or “sold.” She should want that product.

One of my favorite business quotes is from Sam Pettengill, an American congressman from the 1930s...

“The successful producer of an article sells it for more than it cost him to make, and that’s his profit. But the customer buys it only because it is worth more to him than he pays for it, and that’s his profit. No one can long make a profit producing anything... unless the customer makes a profit using it.”

How does this apply to copywriting? Good question...

As a copywriter, your job is to persuade and convince your customer that the product is worth more, far more, than the dollars in her hand.

As a vendor, your job is to deliver the promise. Keep your end of the bargain — don’t use the power of the MYWS! approach to trick people. Not only is it wrong, but on the Internet, you’ll be sorry.

OK then, let's get down to the meat of MYWS!

There's more to writing successful and persuasive sales copy than simply knowing which words to use and in which order. A lot more. That's why it took eight months to write this book.

Sure, a word is a word is a word. But to know which words to use with maximum effect you have to know — really know — exactly what you're talking about. But most importantly...

You need to know to whom you're talking!

You must have experienced the painful and boring phone call from a telemarketer who was reading from a script. Did it move you? Yeah, to the other room!

He was using the same words and the same sales message to different prospects.

If he'd taken the time and trouble to research his prospects by asking the right questions, he could have addressed their individual needs and wants. And by tailoring the benefits specifically for each individual person, his success rate would have been dramatically higher.

It's OK. You don't have to telephone every one of your prospects to find out what makes them tick! But you can get to know them. The degree of success you'll achieve will be in direct proportion to the amount of time you put into your preparation.

So before you write your first word of copy, there are many essential tasks you must complete...

3.1. Get to Know Your Product

Think you know your product? Of course, you do. You live, breathe and think about it all day long. I'll bet you even dream about it!

And you never miss a chance to tell everyone you meet about how fantastic it is and why they should own it. In fact, some of them may have become so bored with your single topic of conversation that they're beginning to avoid you.

But that doesn't answer my question. Do you really know your product? Have you asked your customers which feature or benefit they like the best? Are they finding uses for it that you hadn't thought about? Have you asked a friend to examine it? Or are you so convinced of its excellence, you don't believe it's necessary?

Mistake. Big mistake.

And if you're selling someone else's product, have you revisited their website recently to check on any changes or improvements? If you haven't, then you should. In fact, you must!

Let's be honest here. Unless you know every single teensy-weensy detail about your product, you can't do justice to the copy you write for it. Because as an expert, your enthusiasm, your passion and your knowledge will shine through in your sales message and infect your reader. It's the little things that make the big difference.

3.2. Get to Know Your Industry

Visit the relevant websites that are involved with your industry. Subscribe to their newsletters and keep abreast of what's happening around you. Browse the Amazon.com bookstore and see what's available. You cannot get too much information about a subject that you should know inside out.

Strive to become an expert in your field. Even better, strive to be "THE" expert in your field! Because anything that enhances your knowledge of your industry will help you write informative and interesting copy that will outsell your competitors.

It's surprising what your reader will see "between the lines" of your sales message. Just as she will spot an impostor by the shallowness of his information, she will quickly come to realize that you are the expert she expects you to be.

And from whom do you think she'll be more inclined to buy? That's an easy answer... an amateur, or an expert such as you.

3.3. Get to Know Your Competition

Want to stay ahead of your competitors? Then keep a keen eye on them.

The Internet is such a fast-moving creature that new ideas and innovations are being thrust upon us at a bewildering rate.

So visit your competitors on a regular basis...

Subscribe to their newsletters and get a "feel" for their business. Read between the lines.

Study their sales copy and see which benefits they're concentrating on. Are they the same as yours? Are they different from yours? Are they better than yours?

What is their USP (Unique Selling Proposition)? Are they promising a benefit that you haven't spotted?

Are their prices higher or lower? Are they offering better free bonuses?

Is their sales copy better or worse than yours?

Only by knowing your competitors can you strive to offer greater benefits and write more persuasive sales copy. Becoming an “expert” on your competitors puts you in a better place to outsell them.

Even if you’re the leader in your field, you must know at all times exactly where your competitors are and what they’re doing. Just take your eyes off them for a second and they’ll sneak up on you from behind and steal your market right from under your nose.

3.4. Target Your Market

You can’t be everything to everyone.

Just because your book, “How to Write Successful Web Copy,” is the best that’s ever been written, don’t assume every website owner will want to buy it. They won’t! Of course, you know they should buy it. And yes, for sure, the vast majority will benefit from it... if they read and apply what they learn.

But the cold reality is that some won’t see the need for it, no matter how poor their site copy is. Some won’t be able to afford it. Many will consider it too expensive or too cheap, no matter what the price. Some won’t believe your claims. Many will be too lazy to learn a new subject. Lots of them will be quite satisfied with their present sales.

Hey, it’s a tough world out there!

So it’s pretty obvious. You have to find the people who are most likely to buy from you. What’s the point in knocking your brains out trying to sell to 100,000 non-targeted “anybody’s” if only 10 are likely to buy?

You’ll find it much more profitable aiming at a smaller market of 1,000 interested potential buyers. Your audience is people who need and want what you have to offer. Once you achieve success with these customers, you can concentrate your efforts on finding other target markets, different market segments.

With that in mind, let’s...

3.5. Identify Your “Ideal” Customer

Many people don’t seem to realize there’s a difference between their target market and their target customer (or, as I prefer to say, their “ideal” customer).

Suppose you have a fantastic book that teaches readers to produce top quality website copywriting. (Too late, I already beat you to it!)

Your potential market could be anyone who writes copy of any kind for their online business. Wow! That's an awful lot of people. In fact, it covers every single person with a website or a newsletter! Now all you have to do is promote your book anywhere and everywhere and watch those millions come pouring in.

Boy, oh boy, if only it were that easy!

Well, it could be that easy, if you were wealthy enough and stupid enough to spend a fortune on promotion and advertising. And even then your message would only reach a tiny percentage of the hundreds of millions out there.

Of course, your sales could be high. But your expenditure would be even higher! And your risk of going broke would be guaranteed!

So you have to study your "potential" market and sift out all the least profitable areas. Then sift some more. Keep on sifting until you have a few nuggets of pure potential profit!

Of course, you need to know...

3.6. Where Do You Start?

It may sound obvious but there's no better place than the beginning!

So write down a list of people whom you think may benefit from your book... Bill, Jane, Mom. No, I mean real buying customers. Then select the best market for your product.

How about...

- People who want to improve their Internet sales.
- People with little or no web writing skills.
- People with writing skills who want to improve and sharpen them.
- People who can afford to buy lists of Internet business owners, but who can't afford a pro copywriter.

Does this list tell you something? Does it make you ask who your target market is?

- Large Internet businesses? Hardly. They have huge budgets so hire the pros to do their writing.
- Medium-sized companies? Some of them, yes. But many are either satisfied with their sales, or they can afford to hire a pro copywriter, or they're good writers themselves. So that leaves us with...
- Online small-business owners, and...
- Internet startup companies.

So which of these four “types” will be the most likely to buy, and in the greatest numbers? Yes, you’ve got it... Startups and small businesses!

So now that you know for whom you’re writing, you can craft your sales message to talk directly to your small online business owner. You can set about getting into her mindset and identifying her specific needs and wants.

You can now write your copy with benefits that she’ll specifically identify with. You can highlight benefits that will solve her particular small-business problems.

You’re focused. And you’re also in a much better position to...

3.7. Know Your Customer’s Personality

Obviously, everyone in your target market won’t have the same personality. But if you gauge the most common personality type, you can speak to your reader in the language she feels most comfortable with.

For instance, if you’re selling software, is your ideal customer an experienced techie type? In that case, he may be interested in facts and the technicalities of how your software functions. Just give him the facts and he can think it through.

Are you specifically selling to a teenage geek? He feels comfortable in a laid-back atmosphere. He wants to know the technicalities but also if it’s “cool.”

Or is your ideal customer a senior business manager? Adopt a more formal and business-like tone to your language. She knows what she wants. But she’s not to be swayed by the motivational type of appeal more suited to a self-employed business owner. She needs technical facts and figures to help her arrive at a logical business decision. That’s what she expects from her staff, and from you.

Maybe your ideal customer is a new online startup business owner? Talk to her as one small-business owner to another. She needs help, advice, and someone she can trust. So let her know you understand her problems. “Talk” as you would to a close friend.

It’s so easy to assume that you’re your own best customer. It’s not only easy... it’s natural. After all, you likely conceived your own product because of your own circumstances. But that does not mean that you’re your own ideal customer.

Think it through, and you just may find several new markets for your product and a better “ideal” customer.

3.8. Identify Your Customer’s Wants

You’ve probably read this statement a thousand times or more... Identify your customer’s needs and satisfy them. Well, I’m sorry if this confuses you, but appealing to your her needs is not enough.

For example, your customer may need your search engine software to create more organic visits to her website. But she wants the higher standard of living for herself and her family that your software will generate in extra sales.

She may need your electronic mousetrap in order to create a hygienic environment for her family to live in. But what she may want, more than anything else, is to spend less of her life standing on a kitchen chair!

Read the following sentence slowly, and then read it again because it's vitally important to your whole business future...

Emotions influence our buying decisions, and then we use our logic to justify the purchase.

Your reader may have only seen one mouse in a year. So she may logically think that $10 for your super-duper mousetrap isn't justified. But if she became hysterical when she saw that monster in her kitchen, her emotions would prompt her to buy your killing machine. As a result, she would logically justify the purchase by telling herself she'd have a much more hygienic kitchen!

Let's face it. If we all bought logically, we'd merely buy the basics we need to sustain us. Food, water and shelter are needs. Luxury apartments, exotic holidays and a happy family life are wants.

So once you determine your ideal customer's wants, you can appeal directly to her emotions. Then, and only then, will she buy your products or services.

3.9. Isolate Your Product's Features

Features don't sell. Why? Because they appeal to our logic!

These words describe a feature...

Learn how to write persuasive headlines

And it's logical. In order to run a successful website you should learn how to create the right kind of headlines.

But these words present a benefit...

Learn how to write headlines that will substantially increase your profits

A benefit appeals to your reader's emotions.

I make absolutely no apologies for belaboring this point. It's a critical one. You must be able to separate features from benefits.

Why? Because it's the benefit to your customer, and the way you present it to your customer, that will make or break your business.

A car's 1600 cc engine is a feature of the product. But the $1,000 a year savings in fuel costs is a benefit to the customer.

So you can see that a benefit is a direct, or sometimes indirect, result of a feature. And even though most people think they know the difference, they don't.

Because so many website owners have not yet grasped this important concept, most websites do nothing more than present a list of information! And what's information? It tends to be just a long, boring set of features that don't even remotely interest us. That's why nobody buys from them!

Remember one of Isaac Newton's "Laws of Motion"? "For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction." This is an irrefutable law of nature that cannot be changed.

Well, one of Joe Robson's Laws of Copywriting states "for every feature there are one or more benefits." And this is an equally irrefutable law of marketing!

Your customer gets benefits from the features of your product. So before you can make a list of benefits, you need a complete list of product features.

Examine your product from every angle. If it's a book, read it again. You wrote the book? That's even more reason to read it again. But this time search for features, and write them down immediately. Then...

3.10. Turn Your Features Into Benefits

CAUTION! You are now entering an area of MYWS! that will be hazardous to your financial health if you miss the point. The next three sections are that important!

The only reason your visitor reads your sales message is to find out what's in it for her. And the best way to tell her that is with a list of benefits that will help her get what she wants.

Features won't do it.

Creative and entertaining writing won't do it. And the fact that your gizmo is the fastest selling item on the Web won't do it. That's a great feature but... so what?

Only benefits that will specifically solve her problem and give her what she wants will do it. So every one of your features must be presented as a benefit to her.

And how do you turn features into benefits?

Like this...

3.11. Apply the So What? Technique

Follow along with this demonstration of the technique...

Feature... “It folds flat.”

“So What?”

“It saves valuable space in your kitchen.”

That’s a benefit!

Or how about...

Feature... “It automatically sorts your email.”

“So what?”

“It gives you an extra 30 minutes a day to spend on your online business.”

That’s a benefit!

Later in the book, we take the awesome power of this incredibly simple technique to a completely new level! And you’ll use it to produce unbelievable results, staggeringly successful results.

And I really do mean staggeringly successful! In fact, I’ll show you how to apply the So What? technique in such a unique way that it will actually “force” you to write the most powerful and persuasive sales copy of your life.

Sales copy you never thought you could ever possibly write!

3.12. Identify Your USP

Your Unique Selling Proposition (USP) is the single most important asset you possess. It answers the heart-breaking questions that every one of your readers asks...

“Why should I buy from you?”

“What can you offer me that your competitors can’t?”

Let’s use the following snippet (from Peapod) to show you how So What? works...

Convenience, pure and simple.

Shop anytime, night or day.

Choose your delivery time – any day of the week.

No more trips to the grocery store. No more checkout lanes.

No more lugging groceries.

OK, take the above and ask yourself, “So What?”

“Shopping fits into your schedule, not vice-versa.”

Better. But... So what?

“Because you have better things to do with your time.”

BINGO! There’s no “So what?” to that one. It’s the essence of the shopping experience.

So now let’s rephrase “Work when you must and play when you want”...

Tired of losing time with the old “travel-push-checkout-lug- travel-lug” routine?

Whenever you have 10 minutes free, day or night, “click-and-pick” at Peapod Store.

Then just tell us when you want your choices. You have better things to do with your time.

It’s all about benefits, not features. Keep asking “So What?” and you can’t miss.

Ken’s Notes...

Joe is absolutely right. People continuously confuse benefits with features. It’s so critical for you to completely understand a benefit and, in turn, the benefits of your products.

Let me strengthen that a bit. If you can’t convert product features into customer benefits, you’re doomed to write bad copy.

The good news is that our So What? technique is the single most brilliant way that I’ve ever seen to force you to realize what the benefits are as opposed to what the features are of your product.

I’m going to give away a bit more of the So What? technique now, so you can keep it in mind as we elaborate on it below.

Don’t just ask yourself “So What?” about a feature once. Take the answer and ask yourself “So What?” about that response. Keep doing this until you crystallize that feature into the most important benefit of your product. Keep asking “So What?” until the question stops making sense.

Think I'm over-stressing the importance of this? Nope. Most companies mistake features for benefits over and over again. Why? The answer is simple. Staff may design features into the product but they don't experience the benefits. It's their customers who benefit.

Customers want the benefits, not the features. As an old saying goes...
"Customers don't want quarter-inch drill bits. They want quarter-inch holes."

You simply must deliver benefits, not features. Don't confuse the two, like most business sites do. Your potential customer who lands on your site is probably saying to herself, "Tell me why I should stay here and read your sales message." And if you don't come up with a good reason, a compelling USP, click goes the mouse!

Without a compelling USP you're just another face in the crowd. It's your USP that sets you apart from your competitors.

What do you mean, you don't have a USP? Yes you do! Everybody either has one or they can create one!

And just because your product is the same as lots of others, it doesn't mean that you have no USP. You simply haven't been shown where to find it! Until now, of course!

Here's how and where to look. Think about the benefits of your product and choose the single most important benefit that you can offer your reader. Is it something your competitors offer? If not, great! If they offer something similar, blend your biggest benefit with some unique aspect that you do offer.

Write down a full description of your personal experience and your company's background. Is there something in there that your competitors can't match? Perhaps you have a number of years as a personal consultant, advising business owners on the best uses for your product. Can your competitors claim the same amount of professional expertise as you?

They can? If that's so, then combine your biggest benefit with something that your competitors haven't even thought to offer. For instance, overnight delivery may be a standard feature in your industry so it may never be mentioned by you, or by your competitors. But does your potential customer know? Or is it a big secret? Reveal it and feature it as your USP.

Are your potato chips "90% fat-free?" Or do they only contain "10% fat" like the others?

Have 197,450 downloads of your software been sold in 5 months? Or do you simply tell your reader "It's the fastest selling app of its type on the market" like the competition does?

There are countless ways to present you, your product, or your company in a way that's perceived by your reader to be unique or different.

Your most important benefit does not have to be something that's actually different, although that's your first choice! If you're stuck for a point of true difference, your USP can be a benefit that appears to be unique in the eyes of your potential customer!

So you see? You do have a USP. You just haven't looked hard enough. Relax. I'll show you how to do that in more depth in a later chapter. Until then...

Start digging for it now because it's crucial that you find an outstanding USP. Get a head start. Write it down. Then compare and see if it meets the criteria that I discuss later on.

Once you find your USP, thrust it in front of your reader where it's impossible to miss. If it's missed, click and away she goes.

Ken's Notes...

Let me give you a hand, before you reach the detailed chapter on the USP... Your Unique Selling Proposition is your product's most powerful benefit, combined with a strong, unique aspect of your business. It tells why potential customers should buy your product from your company.

Here's how to develop your USP...

1. What are you selling? Write down what your product is and does.
2. What is the benefit to your customer? What pain does it cure, or what gain does it provide?
3. What's unique about your product (or you)? What makes your business stand out from the competition? Keep working on this until you can clearly separate yourself from the field. There must be a convincing reason for doing business with you, instead of with your competitor.
4. Summarize the above into one tight, powerful, motivating sentence that will persuade your customer to do business with you, to trade her money for the benefits delivered by your product.

As you start to work through the above four steps, you may find this to be a lot harder than it looks. Don't blow it off and give up! You must have a USP. If this exercise was easy, everyone would have a great USP! Come up with a tight, sharp USP that SELLS your customer.

There's a second benefit to this exercise. (This time the benefit is for you!) It will crystallize your own vision of what you do! Write down your USP. Keep it firmly fixed in your mind.

Match your USP to your “ideal” customer’s strongest motivator, either “pain” or “gain.”

1. Pain: She feels deprived, whether that involves wealth, health, love, or happiness. Show her how you help in the area that she’s deprived in. Make it clear that you understand her problem and that you have the cure for her pain or fear of loss.
2. Gain: Stress the single most important positive benefit that you offer to your customer, in language she’ll appreciate.

Bottom line? Boil your product down into a short, sharp benefit-laden punch. Whether you use “pain” or “gain” will depend on the nature of your particular product and target market. But, whichever approach you choose, make it tighter and tighter, sharper and sharper. Hone it until it’s razor-sharp.

If your USP answers the “What’s in it for me?” question, you’re halfway to the sale. What if it makes her ask, “Who cares? So what?” There will be a quick exit from your site unless you can answer that “So what?” By doing so you get closer to your USP.

Think hard on this and write down your best idea about your USP. Then keep it nearby until you reach the chapter on USP.

Now we come to a really exciting section of this chapter. You’re about to learn something that very few of your competitors ever consider, let alone apply. Once you grasp this concept, your sales will soar!

Let’s see how to...

3.13. Experience Your Reader’s Mindset

Giving your reader everything she wants is a whole lot easier if you already know what she wants. And how do you do that?

Well, you’ve probably been advised on many occasions to put yourself into her shoes. Personally, I find it rather uncomfortable squeezing into high heels.

So here’s a more practical and more effective way of doing it. In fact, it’s the only way to really find out what she really wants. Get inside her mind.

Imagine how she’s feeling as she visits your website. What is she looking for? Why is she there in the first place? Think like her. Put yourself in her situation, and imagine her reaction to each element of your sales copy.

What’s going through her mind when she reads your headline? What is she searching for? You know what she needs, but what does she really want? And most important of all, are you providing it?

Become your customer.

3.14. Ready? Set Your MWR

Ken developed the concept of Most Wanted Response (MWR) in his now-classic Make Your Site SELL!. Since then, you see more and more people using this simple, descriptive term.

The concept is simple. You don't write a single word, create a single graphic, decide on navigation or anything else until you know what you want your customer to do when she visits your site. In other words, what do you most want your customer to do?

Decide now, because everything you do from here on in will try to get that Most Wanted Response.

Study Ken's main Solo Build It! sales site...

<https://buildit.sitesell.com>

Note how his informative content pulls his visitors smoothly through the Content → Traffic → PREsell → Monetize business-building process right to the order page, his MWR.

Finished already? OK, it's time for...

4. Copywriting 101 – Getting the Basics Right

“Putting pen to paper lights more fires than matches ever will!”

– Malcolm Forbes

Every trade, profession, organization and sport has its own set of fundamental rules. And even though there’s room for innovation and creativity, it’s the “rules” that hold things together. The most creative and skillful soccer player in the world still plays within the boundaries of the fundamental rules of the game.

And copywriting is no different. Of course, you’re right. I shouldn’t use the word “rules” when it comes to copywriting, especially for the ever-changing Internet. Otherwise, we’d have no room for change or progress.

However, it’s important to know that the essential fundamentals of copywriting have been successfully applied for many decades. The emphasis is on “successfully.”

Unfortunately, the Internet is saturated with sub-standard and poorly crafted sales copy that breaks every one of these “rules.” That’s the very reason why sales copy like that is so unsuccessful.

The following two chapters (Copywriting 101 and 102) contain the fundamentals of Internet writing. I pulled together every important copywriting basic that exists. And then I...

- weeded out “offline rules” that make no sense on the Internet,
- modified others so that they fire on all online cylinders, and...
- added new “online rules” that Ken and I have discovered.

The fundamentals of good copywriting should not be ignored. By all means, be creative and stamp your individual identity into your copy.

But until you have a lot of copywriting experience behind you, stick to the tried and proven copywriting basics. They’re the foundation for what comes later in this book. So let’s have a look at these untouchables.

4.1. Write Scanner-Friendly Copy

You know, life can be so unkind. You work, sweat, and burn that candle to produce your devastatingly persuasive site copy. You love it! And without any doubt, every single visitor is going to hang on every word you write.

But what happens? She scans it! Sheesh!

With absolutely no regard for your feelings, or your bank balance, she selfishly skims through your copy looking for something of benefit to her.

Well, she does control the mouse. So like it or not, you must write to be scanned.

As she skims down your page, she's looking for an overall snapshot of what you have to offer her. So design your headline, sub-headings, and illustrations to...

- Increase her curiosity
- Raise her interest, and...
- Retain her attention

And if she's interested, she'll click back to the top and read your message in detail. You do have a "back to top of page" link or button, don't you? Of course, you do. You're not one of those people who assume their reader will take the time and trouble to scroll all the way back up to the top.

You also know that to grab, and retain, your reader's attention, it's necessary that you...

4.2. Write an Opening Headline That Sells

If you understand your customer's mindset, you know she has one thing on her mind when she clicks onto your site... to find out what your site can do for her.

It's selfish self-interest at play! But you do have to cater to her, if you want her business. And you only have a couple of seconds to catch her eye and g-r-a-b her attention, so present her with a headline that promises her exactly what she wants.

Absolutely nothing less will do!

And if she's interested, she may just consider scanning the rest of your copy to find out how you're going to do it! She has no sympathy for the time and effort you've put into building your business. She won't be impressed by a beautifully crafted logo, in the prime, top-center position on your page.

At this point in your site, she has no idea that your unique, pocket-sized, remote-controlled roto-rooter is everything she's looking for. Why? She's in a hurry so she's scanning the page quickly. Only an attention-grabbing headline, one that promises to solve her problem and give her what she wants, will slow her down.

Now here's a staggering statistic to bear in mind. Up to 80% of your readers will only read your opening headline!

It's painful, isn't it? 80 out of every 100 visitors will read your headline. If it doesn't grab their attention in a millisecond, click goes the mouse!

So it makes a lot of sense to spend 80% of your time and effort in writing your opening headline. And once you've written that eyeball-grabbing sign post, you have to draw her into your sales message with a...

4.3. Fast Moving, Stimulating Introduction

Your introductory paragraph has to flow easily and seamlessly from your headline. It has to keep your reader's eyes moving and generate a rhythm.

So make it brief. And to the point!

Don't keep her hanging about by rambling on about... "Welcome to my website. It's my intention to show you the most amazing... blah, blah, blah." She ain't there to be entertained. If you want to entertain an audience, get yourself into show biz!

She wants to know exactly what you have to offer. And, most importantly, what you have to offer her. Your reader demands to know that now! Not half way down the page. And certainly not on the next page! As far as she's concerned, Blah, Blah means Nah, Nah. Click!

So get straight into it! Once your USP-based opener has pulled your visitor more deeply into your site, she can get settled for a more prolonged visit. So...

4.4. Identify Yourself

As soon as you feel the moment's right, introduce yourself!

After all, she's been brought up not to speak to strangers. And that's who you are.

But for heaven's sake, don't bore her with a "me" message! She ain't interested. If your background and expertise are of particular relevance and can reinforce your message, then it's important to reassure her that she's dealing with an "expert."

But don't talk about yourself right at the very beginning. In fact, don't even talk about you at all. Talk about how you can benefit her because of your special or unique experience with your product or service.

For instance, if you're selling a book on growing prize-winning roses, your personal 20-year track record in winning rose-growing competitions will add credibility and impact to your sales message — if you mention it early in your copy.

But unless you are your USP, don't introduce yourself too soon. If you're not an instantly recognizable "big name" in your particular field, don't jump straight in with the "I am" type of message. Tell her farther down the page.

And what if your background can offer no particular benefit to your reader? You should still introduce yourself with a short one or two line “name and number.” Why?

Well, nobody likes to do business with a faceless company. We feel much more comfortable if we know the “face behind the page.” And introducing yourself to someone you’re talking to is just good manners!

Ken’s Notes...

Good point. Provide brief “credentializing” info. Not about you, though. Give info about what you can do for your customer, and why!

Tuck all the “you” stuff into an “About Me/Us” page.

OK. Now let’s look at another important element in writing effective sales copy...

4.5. Use Lots of Subheadings

Subheadings are widely regarded as tools used by a copywriter to break long blocks of text into smaller sections. But they’re more than that.

They’re really mini-headlines. And they should tell your reader what to expect if she reads the following paragraphs.

Subheadings are also ideal for scanners to quickly grasp the overall topic of your message as they skim over your sales message. So each subheading must be carefully crafted to form the framework of your scanner’s snapshot.

Take a look at the subheadings in this chapter. Do they tell an overall story? Do they tell you what to expect if you read the copy? Do they say what they mean? Or are they clever-but-confusing “plays upon words”?

Well, I’m glad you agree because I know you’re not reading this chapter for entertainment. You’re reading it for a purpose — how it will benefit you. And clever, cute subheadings will tell you nothing!

However, there’s something else. Subheadings also act as signposts throughout your copy. If your visitor loses her bearings somewhere on your page, a subheading is the ideal beacon to guide her back from no-man’s land.

“Clever” sign posts, on the other hand, simply confuse your reader and leave her so frustrated she’ll leave your site in a flash. She may get lost, but there’s one thing she’ll find very easily — the back button out of your site!

Key point? Use plenty of mini-headlines and lots of time and effort to write them. Don’t skimp and “make do,” because you’ll regret it!

To test the effectiveness of your subheadings, try this exercise. List your subheadings without any other text. Do they give a thumbnail sketch of your story by outlining a brief overview of your sales message? And is your brief overview interesting enough to compel your reader to read your sales message?

Re-write your subheadings until they do!

Ken's Notes...

Listing your subheadings without any other text, what a great idea! I've always spent lots of time crafting my subheadings throughout the rest of the page. They're so important, for several reasons...

Subheadings divide the copy into "digestible" chunks.

They're benefit-focused, so they pull the reader through.

They make scanning easy.

However, I never really thought about the fact that subheadings could, by themselves, tell the story!

When you think about it, customers who are mildly interested will, at a minimum, quickly scroll through your site and read the subheadings only. If your subheadings tell the story, those who are interested will settle in to read more.

4.6. Write in Chunks

Look at how this page is laid out. Can you imagine how virtually unreadable it would be if it were simply one unbroken piece of copy?

There's absolutely nothing better guaranteed to get your reader scurrying for the back button, than being greeted with a huge unbroken block of black text.

It looks so intimidating, and also very boring... an endless sea of unbroken text, stretching from one side of the screen to the other. Why do they do that? Don't they read their own copy when it's finished?

Even long-distance swimmers need a rest now and then. So unless you're determined to drive your reader straight to your competitors...

- Break your text up into smaller digestible chunks.
- Precede each chunk with a subheading.
- Make sure that each chunk covers one particular subject.
- Separate those chunks with plenty of white space.

Remember to write each individual chunk so that even when read in isolation, it stands on its own merit and makes sense to your reader. This makes it a whole lot easier to read and to scan.

4.7. Start Each Paragraph With a BANG!

When your visitor scans, she only reads the first few words of each paragraph. That means those first words must get straight to the point by describing the benefit.

So don't use a sentence like this to start a paragraph that leads into the benefit...

`And one thing you should always be aware of when running a home business is...`

She'll scan this slow-to-start, empty sentence and skip the rest of the paragraph. End result? She misses your all-important benefit.

Careful, this seems like a small tip. It's not.

Even seasoned copywriters make this mistake. Don't waste time with a lengthy sentence to start a paragraph. Get to the point! If there's just one sentence read by your visitor, it will be the first one.

And one more tip in the same vein. Help her tendency to stop on the first sentence by bolding a word or two in it. Once you've stopped her, and she reads a benefit that hits home, she'll slow down and read.

4.8. Vary the Length of Paragraphs

A succession of neatly arranged paragraphs may look great to you. It may give your copy a neat, orderly appearance. And you may well think that it reflects on your professionalism.

But to your reader, neatness and regimentation spell only one thing. Boredom!

Varying paragraph length prevents monotony. The copy is easier on the eye and "more fun" to read. As your reader skips quickly from paragraph to paragraph and from benefit to benefit, it helps stop those scanning eyes.

Uneven paragraphs stop the eyes from scanning past your copy. They especially tend to stop on one-line paragraphs. So use one-liners for important benefits. They can add substantially to the impact of your message.

Really!

A paragraph should never go much past four lines, five tops. Break longer paragraphs into smaller ones, or use bullets if long lists are involved (see discussion below). This is especially important to remember for visitors using mobile devices, where screen width is much narrower than on a computer.

Best advice? Vary the length of your paragraphs and sections into different sized chunks. Same goes for the components of your paragraphs. Try to...

4.9. Keep Sentences Short

There's no place on the Web for long sentences that seem to go on and on and give the impression that they will never stop no matter how long it takes to get the lengthy message across to the reader in the forlorn hope that she will buy your product.

Sorry about that.

There's no place on the Web for long sentences. Sentences that give the impression that they will never stop won't sell! No matter how long they go on. And remember...

It takes 20% longer to read a computer screen than a printed page. So short sentences are a lot easier to read and they're a lot less tiring for your reader.

Different sentence lengths also substantially reduce the risk of monotony. And here's something that can add dramatic impact to your message. A short sentence works!

And while we're on the subject of "easy-on-the eye" text...

4.10. Write in Simple Language

Not because your reader is simple-minded! You're talking to her on a one-to-one basis so you need to speak in a conversational tone. And in real life we tend to use simple words to express ourselves.

Think about some government politicians and city hall officials who make statements to the media. Boy, they sure are "educated," aren't they? They make impressive statements like...

`"After a long, constructive and deep searching debate, the members of the City Finance Executive Committee have examined this precarious situation and have reached the unanimous consensus that the problem is not insurmountable."`

They could have said it more simply..."We've realized that there's a way to solve the problem." After all, that's what they would have said to their colleagues, one-to-one.

And that's exactly how you should "talk" in your sales copy. You have to "speak" to your reader in ordinary language so that ordinary people can identify with you.

Most people read at sixth grade level. If you write copy well above that level, you achieve three things...

- Many of your potential readers won't understand what you have to say.
- Many will feel alienated because they think you're "more educated" than them.
- And many will believe you're just showing off.

1, 2, 3... Click! Click! Click! That doesn't leave a lot of readers, does it?

It's uncomfortable sitting upright and reading on a screen. And everyone wants to get to the bottom line as fast as possible! So make it as easy as possible.

Even the smartest folks have to work harder to interpret endless, polysyllabic sentences. Don't do that to them. Write your message in the simple, everyday language that everyone understands.

Remember the time-honored phrase taught to salespeople the world over... K.I.S.S. (Keep It Simple Stupid!)

And make sure you...

4.11. Saturate Your Copy With Benefits

The overriding question on your reader's mind as she scans through your copy is always "What's in this for me?"

She doesn't want to hear about which awards you've won. Or how long your company has been exporting gizmos to eastern Mongolia.

So from the headline right through to your order page, tell her how much she'll benefit by using your product. Features are secondary. Interesting, maybe, but definitely not on her list of priorities.

The only way to keep her glued to your message is to saturate your copy with benefits.

Benefits, benefits, benefits! And even more benefits.

There are many things you can overdo when writing your sales copy. But you can never offer your reader too many benefits! Have I made my point?

A picture may paint a thousand words, but a dozen strong benefits will sell more product than a hundred features. As long as you...

4.12. Stick to the Point

Writing sales copy can be an absorbing and satisfying job. Along the way, though...

Your inner need to tell your reader everything about you, your company and your product constantly conflicts with the necessity to keep your copy short, sharp and customer-focused.

And, unfortunately, it's far too easy to stray from the overriding purpose of your message, which is to sell!

Every word, sentence and paragraph must help to sell.

Before your customer buys, she must first learn about your product's benefits. And if your copy wanders from the point for as much as a moment — click.

Make sure every sentence is sharply focused on your MWR (she buys your product). If it's not, you'll very quickly achieve your LWR (Least Wanted Response) — click!

Staying focused, though, doesn't mean writing a short sales message. Because...

4.13. Long Copy Outsell Short Copy. Here's How to Offer Both

What's one of the biggest turnoffs for visitors? Having to constantly click through to another page every few seconds just to continue reading your sales message.

Some marketers seem totally obsessed with keeping pages short. Why? Because they must have read somewhere that they should keep their pages short! The gurus say, "Readers get bored with long copy."

Well to paraphrase Mae West (I think)... It's not the length. It's what you do with it!

In more polite terms, it's boring content that bores! Not long content.

Before your reader can make a buying decision she needs three things...

Information. Information. More Information.

How else can she make a balanced decision on whether your product is the one best suited for her?

So which action has the greatest chance of breaking the momentum of the flow of information? Scrolling down a "long" page? Or being forced to click and wait for a new page to load?

If she's interested in what you have to offer, and it's written in a professional way, she'll scroll as far as necessary to learn as much as she possibly can about it.

But if you haven't yet hooked her on what you're offering, which way will she be inclined to click when she comes to an unnecessary break in the page? Forward? Or backward?

Is it really so difficult to scroll down a long page? Take a close look at the 5% of marketers who are really making money on the Internet. How many of them sadistically force you to click from one page to the next, every few seconds? That's right. None!

What does this mean for you? Study the techniques of the successful and ask yourself why they believe that long copy always outsells short copy!

Ken's Notes...

Start your copy at the beginning. Make it as long as necessary to get the sale and then end it. Include it all on one page. Every time you require a click, you lose a percentage of visitors.

It's far easier and more natural to continue reading as you scroll a page. Forcing a link brings progress to a stop — it creates a decision point. You will always lose a percentage of visitors at that point, no matter how good a writer you are.

We put up different pages on our SiteSell site. Each has a totally different function. But the basic sales effort is always kept on a single page. No matter how long it needs to be.

One last point. Long copy outsells shorter, but you don't have to decide. Offer both and let your customer decide. When we did this, sales increased 25-30%.

Makes you think, doesn't it? And here's something else to think about...

4.14. Jargon Is a Sin

Don't be a sinner!

An article on writing a great sales letter recently appeared on the Web. Who do you feel would be interested in learning from it? Well, experienced copywriters, of course.

The main readership, though, would surely be those people who want to learn how to write a great sales letter.

Unfortunately, the article was sprinkled with "technical" words like... "prepositions" and "leaders" and "dangling participles" and well, you're bored already, aren't you?

So if he lost my attention, what chance did he have of keeping the attention of his target audience? An audience that probably thought that before they could learn how to write a good sales letter, they first had to study for a degree in English!

Well, one thing is for sure. While you're reading this book, I won't be explaining why you shouldn't have "dangling participles." Whatever they are!

Like I said. Jargon is a sin. Never use it! Or you'll end up with more than your participles dangling. Your business, for example!

And while we're on the subject of jargon, bear in mind that...

4.15. Techies Do Not Prefer Technical Copy

Even techies need a break! The only suitable place for technical language is in a technical journal.

Can you imagine an engineer curling up in front of a log fire, avidly consuming a book on "The Atomic Structure of Cyber Dross?" Well, maybe, one or two. But the vast majority of your readers just won't be interested. In fact, they'll run a mile in the opposite direction!

Did you learn the technicalities of the internal combustion engine before you bought your last car? Did you need to know these technicalities? Or was it enough to know that the power of its high-tech engine will be a major benefit the next time you're pursued by the highway patrol?

And when you download the latest upgrade to your favorite software program, will you be even remotely interested in the technical specifications and details?

Nah. All you want to know is how it will specifically help you. Is it faster? Is it easier to use? Does it crash less often?

Will the benefits outweigh the cost?

And if it's important that some of your readers see the actual technical details, then give the majority of your readers a break. List the technical stuff on a separate "technical details" page where it belongs.

In your sales message, only speak a language that non-techies will feel comfortable with.

Let me give you a personal example. A few months ago, I wrote a direct mail package and full-page computer magazine ads for an international database software development company.

What's that? Well, I didn't know either!

It was so technical that it took me a week to translate their existing sales literature from "techie-speak" into English. Their literature was written by and aimed at very technically minded people (computer programmers, in particular).

However, I wrote the new sales message in layman's language. Because I knew from past experience that even technical people don't always understand everything technical. And tomorrow's techie is today's newbie.

Sales increased by 400%.

The bottom line is that even techies prefer simple-speak.

Here's a classic example. It's a newsletter ad, written by a techie who must think that the rest of the world is exactly like him...

```
XYZ Jukebox is integrated digital music-management software for the home. It combines a CD ripper, MP3 encoder, playlist maker, ID3 tag editor, and media player in one package. CD audio is digitally extracted and encoded directly to MP3
format with no intermediary WAV file, using Xing MPEG encoding technology.
```

Hmm, I wonder if it would play music CDs on my computer? My point is that this software might make a great deal of difference to my lifestyle. If I knew what it was exactly, I might be tempted to buy it!

Remember that even technical people understand plain language! And they prefer it!

Ken's Notes...

I agree with Joe's point here, with one proviso. Techies, in general, are a different personality type. They resist a "sales pitch" rather vigorously. So while the language should be simple and direct in tone, the sales effort needs to be a bit more subdued and factual to please this type of customer.

I rely on dry humor to help lighten up what could easily become a seriously boring subject. But remember that...

4.16. Humor Is a Serious Business

Selling a humorous product? Make them laugh, if you can. But if you're like the rest of us, the best thing is not to use humor!

Selling is a deadly serious business. And so is buying. Always remember that your reader is at your site to do business, not to be entertained.

The Web is a vast global market place and humor is interpreted differently by all of us. For instance...

Bob Hope, in his prime, was a very successful comedian. But his jokes were written by hard-headed writers who took their business very seriously. And despite his enormous popularity, I can guarantee there were many, many people with whom he couldn't even raise a smile!

So if you're ever tempted to use humor in your advertising materials, bear this in mind. People don't buy from clowns. They laugh at them!

4.17. Be Careful With Negative Words

Don't say "No" in your headlines or subheadings! It can very easily be misread.

Why? It's all to do with the mechanics of reading. Let's use this sentence as an example... Paris in the the spring is a beautiful city.

Now go back, and read each individual word again. Most readers miss the repeated the. I'm not about to go into the technicalities of why. Who cares? It's enough to know that our brains sometimes don't see the same words as our eyes.

Consider this. Your reader is probably scanning. Shame on her. Her eyes dart quickly down through your text, looking for something of interest. Your subheading reads...

To be a good copywriter requires no education.

A rapid scanner could easily read it as...

To be a good copywriter requires education.

And, who wants to go back to college? Click! Need I say more?

And that's not the only reason to avoid negatives...

4.18. Negative Tone = No Sales Zone

Your sales message must create and maintain a positive tone. It needs to uplift and motivate your reader into buying from you.

Focus on the positives and eliminate the negatives. It's better to be positive like this...

Hundreds of people just like you have lifted themselves from the low-income bracket to over $1000 a week by using the Biz-Wiz System.

Rather than to write a negative message like this...

Are you struggling just to pay your bills on a below average salary? A low salary, which never even seems to keep pace with today's rising inflation?

And do you panic when the mortgage is due? Then the Biz-Wiz...

You're about to promise a solution for her problem. And you've probably heard of the pain or gain type of headline. However, if you overdo the pain, she won't be around long enough to read about the gain.

Marketers often address "pain" negatively, throwing it into their customers' faces. Bad news. The pain must be felt "between the lines" of your copy.

Done well, it's a strong selling approach. But do it negatively, and all you'll get is a negative response.

Do her and yourself a favor. Keep your message positive! And be sure to...

4.19. Keep Your Message Hype-Free

Remember what I said about the blind leading the blind? No matter how often you see it on the Internet, hype does not sell! Your reader will see through anything that even smells of it.

Why do so many marketers use this useless worn-out tactic? It's almost natural! They read so many sites like this that they assume the approach must work.

Then they simply squawk the words they've heard from everyone else. The tragedy is that they're imitating the wrong parrots... er... people.

These marketers are the blind, being led by the equally blind 95 percenters who are stumbling around in the dark. If you choose to imitate someone, then study the techniques of the successful 5 percenters!

It's a fact of life. Nobody likes to be "sold." And your customer is no exception! So if she begins to suspect anything that resembles an over-statement or a half-truth, she'll immediately raise her defenses and there's that click sound again!

There's a huge difference between hard sell and hype. We'll be dealing with both in more detail in later chapters. But for the moment, it's enough to know that hype is a gross overuse of superlatives.

And too many SUPERLATIVES in your BRILLIANT SALES MESSAGE will produce less of the AMAZING PROFITS you can EASILY GENERATE if you choose to write FANTASTIC PROFIT-MAKING HYPE-FREE Sales Copy for your MIND-BLOWING gizmo!!!!!!

Got the message?

Terrific! Now let's advance to Copywriting 102...

5. Copywriting 102 – More Than Just Words

“We are all salesmen every day of our lives.”

- Charles M. Schwab

Copywriting is not about writing. It's about selling!

It's about squeezing every last drop of profit from your marketing by using every technical and psychological skill that you can muster.

Your sales message is the salesperson, and your words are the means of delivering that message from your mind right into the head of your customer. To achieve maximum success, you need to study the psychology of selling, and the many different ways that the persuasive power of your words can be delivered.

It's this skillful mix that separates the professionals... from those who just have a website!

Let's study key non-word issues of great Web copywriting...

5.1. Use Lots of White Space

A scene destined to send your visitor scurrying to the back button is a seemingly endless sea of black text. You know what happens if she sees a big, dense page of text, don't you? Yup... click!

The plain truth is that she won't even attempt to navigate this daunting obstacle course. She visits your site for information. And she needs to obtain it easily and quickly. Any hurdles in her way will simply divert her somewhere else.

What's white space? It's a term used for the empty space between and around your text (like the spaces between the paragraphs on this page).

Intelligent use of this effective copywriting tool creates an uncluttered and easy-to-read site. Use it liberally to break your message into chunks... and then into even smaller pieces for easier digestion.

First impressions mean everything. And large unbroken blocks of text tell your visitor that you're both untidy and unprofessional.

How would you feel if you entered a store to be met by hundreds of identical brown cartons stacked up high, one on top of the other? Would you even bother attempting to dig around to find what you want? Or would you immediately turn on your heels and make a fast exit?

Well, it's even worse on a website. If your visitor is confronted with a mountain of words, stacked one above the other, she'll only have one goal in mind. Click! She's gone.

And she has the same attitude towards graphics because...

5.2. Graphics Must Enhance Your Message

It's true that a picture can paint a thousand words. But only if it supports and strengthens your sales message!

Photographs of your clinically uncluttered executive office are just as boring to your visitors as they are to your neighbors!

So if you feel the need to illustrate your website then please...

Display a picture of your product and not your factory.

A photograph of yourself at the side of your opening sentence can help reassure your visitor, and add to your credibility. But a photo of you and your Lear Jet will only antagonize her.

Try this simple idea to test the true value of your graphics. Delete all the text from your page! Careful. Got a copy made? Now, as you look at a "text-free" page, answer these questions honestly, no matter how attached you've become to those attractive pictures and gizmos...

- Do they tell your visitor anything?
- Do they say something about your product or service?
- Do they do anything to help you achieve your Most Wanted Response?

If you can't honestly and truthfully say yes, then do yourself and your visitor a huge favor and kick them off!

And do the same with those fancy fonts. Always...

5.3. Use a Reader-Friendly Font

No matter how much you love different fonts and no matter how pretty you think they look, they have no place on your website. Period! Exclamation mark!

Your reader needs to absorb your information as quickly and as comfortably as she can. Fancy fonts have the opposite effect. They will slow her down to a standstill because the brain must first figure out what's being written.

When we read, we don't examine every letter and build them into a word. We recognize the shape of complete words, even some groups of words as we skim over them.

That's why we don't spot mistakes in our typing (like the Paris sentence earlier in this chapter). As our eyes scan the sentence, our memory thinks that it recognizes the whole phrase and ignores the extra word.

Since fancy fonts are not in general use in reading material, our eyes don't easily recognize whole words or phrases. So we have to slow our reading down and build each word, one by one.

THAT'S WHY IT TAKES SO MUCH LONGER TO READ ALL CAPS LIKE THIS. OUR "GRAY CELLS" HAVE TO SELECT A LOWER GEAR AND SLOWLY READ EACH WORD ONE AT A TIME.

After a very short period concentrating on ALL CAPS, your reader will tire and lose interest. And what about the scanners who visit your site? Yes, those heartless creatures who are simply skimming through your copy? They won't be pleased at all because fancy fonts don't scan easily. In fact, most scanners find them impossible to read.

And it's highly likely your visitor is a scanner... click.

However, your scanner will love you if you...

5.4. Use a Black Font on a Light Background

What color is your daily newspaper? White? And what color is the text? Black? And when you see a newspaper ad written with white text against a black background, is it easier or more difficult to read?

By all means, use imaginative color schemes to enhance and reinforce the impact of your sales message... in your graphics! But use only black text on a white or a very pale background for the text of your sales copy. Anything else is just too uncomfortable, too slow, for your reader. And she's the one in control!

Why should she bother struggling to read your message just because you insist on satisfying your ego by placing more importance on your creative talents than her needs?

That may be what you want, but she's the one with the mouse! So give her what she wants. Which also means that you must...

5.5. Use Bullets

No matter how much you break your text into digestible pieces, there are occasions when you have a large chunk of important information to get across to your reader. This is where bullets come in handy.

Use bullets whenever you find yourself making a comma-separated list. It's the best way to do it because it's easier to read, it scans far more quickly, and the reader absorbs more information.

Whoops! Should have used bullets with that last sentence. Let's try again. It's the best way to do it because...

- The format is easier to read.
- It scans far more quickly.
- The reader absorbs more information.

Don't make your list too long, whatever you do — 5 bullets maximum in the list. Otherwise, your reader will become restless and skim over them.

If you must display a long bulleted list, then break it with a relevant line of text (like this one) and continue with another list. For example, bullets are superior because...

- They look better at first glance, encouraging your visitor to dive right in.
- They're more effective than knives.
- I've run out of reasons.

Since bullets are ideal for scanning, make sure every word counts.

Here's another little-known tip the pros use effectively...

5.6. Use a "P.S."

P.S. is an abbreviation for "Post Script," which is Latin, which means... Ahem, enough already. Who cares what it means? What it can do for you is what matters.

In an offline sales letter, a P.S. after the signature is the most read part of the message, next to the headline. We often scan through a message to see something that may interest us.

We first scan the headline. If we're in a hurry or we're only partially interested, our curiosity draws our attention to the end. Because we want to know who it's from!

And when we find a persuasive benefit skillfully written in the form of a P.S., we somehow find ourselves forced to read the whole letter!

Successful copywriters use it effectively to increase response. So try using a P.S. strategy after your “Best regards” on your autoresponder or at the bottom of your newsletter or as an introduction to your email signature file.

Put your P.S. into practice. It’s the most under-used Call to Action on the Internet. Until now, that is!

Make your P.S. effective by restating a benefit, or ideally introducing a new benefit that you haven’t already covered.

P.S. Here’s a technique that will make your sales response soar...

5.7. Make Your Testimonials Sell!

Testimonials are one of your most productive sales tools. How come?

Well, think about it. What’s the biggest single factor your reader will look for if she decides your product is just what she wants?

Your credibility!

Can she trust you? Are you who you say you are? Does your product do exactly what you say it will do? Will you deliver after she pays her money? Will you really give her the after-sales service that you promise? Are you just another scam artist?

Hey! How dare she think those things about you!

Overcome these fears and doubts convincingly by telling her what your present customers have experienced. One really credible testimonial can sell more product for you than a whole page of well-crafted and professionally written sales copy.

So regard each testimonial you receive as a 100-carat diamond. Don’t hide them away on a separate testimonials page. Your reader won’t look for them! Instead, look for imaginative ways to build them into your sales message where they won’t be missed.

Testimonials are incredibly persuasive. If you can get your customer to read a testimonial, you have jumped quite a bit ahead in your sales effort. And they’re like potato chips — once she reads one, she wants another... and another.

The keys to an effective testimonial...

The testimonial makes a specific statement that’s a benefit to your visitor, something your target market understands (“Hey, that’s exactly what I want!”). The very best ones are real-life success stories from typical customers — when others read these, they should think, “Wow! If I can get the same result, it’s more than worth the price!”

<https://case-studies.sitesell.com>

The testimonial has an air of believability, because the testimonial is real (never make up testimonials). Clean up horrible typos or misspellings, but don't turn a testimonial into a polished piece. They're much more believable when they're "real."

The best testimonial is verifiable, with full name and email address included. The key is credibility. Make it impossible for your potential customer to say, "They probably made it up." Provide the URL if it's a business customer, but don't do it as a link (unless you open a new window). You don't want visitors to leave your site.

Testimonials don't just mean reviews by happy readers. If you have a great review from an authority in your field, put it on the site. The huge credibility will drive sales. Same if the New York Times has written an article about you!

Bottom line? Weave testimonials into your sales message. Not only will your reader read them — they'll strengthen your message, increase your credibility and dramatically improve your sales.

Don't be a miser by hoarding your gold dust away in the dark. Share!

And here's another profitable gem...

5.8. Text Links Sell Better Than Banners

Want your reader to click through to another page, or another site? Banners are the least successful way to achieve that.

Substantially increase your clicks by telling your reader about the benefits she will receive by clicking through. And offer her a text link to it.

Don't get me wrong. Banner links have their uses where space is at a premium.

But they have a low click-through rate because they telegraph a "buy me" signal.

They shout, "Click me and I'll sell you something." And we all have a natural resistance to being sold to.

On the other hand, a strategically placed text link says, "Click me if you're interested in learning more about this subject." It uses words to persuade. And persuasion is what selling is all about.

In fact, these aren't the only links that many of your competitors under-use...

5.9. Make Your Navigation Links Sell!

Your reader won't click your navigation links just out of curiosity. You have to give her a good reason. She certainly doesn't want to wander off into the unknown!

Yet, most marketers don't use their navigation text to maximum effect.

How many times have you re-visited a website and discovered pages that you never knew existed on your first time around? It wasn't until you drilled down that you suddenly came across the very information you had been looking for the first time.

On the other hand, how many times have you clicked a link only to arrive at a page you'd already visited from a differently worded link?

If you have a book to sell, use your text link imaginatively to sell your reader the benefits of clicking through. Don't offer her a link that says, "My Book." Why should she investigate that? What's in it for her?

But a link with an intriguing title such as "Florida Uncovered — Free Download" will generate significantly better results.

Speaking of "free," it's important to...

5.10. Sell Your Freebies

It's human nature to assume that something given for free has little value.

How many free e-books have you downloaded and completely forgotten about? How many of these freebies have you stumbled across in the dark recesses of your computer? Dozens? Join the club!

Now if you have a freebie to give away, presumably, it's for a good reason. Otherwise what's the point? After all, if it's not worth having, you're only harming yourself.

A 3-page report consisting of commonly accessed, regurgitated information is an insult to your visitor. And it's a guaranteed way to lose a potential buyer.

Your freebie must be of benefit to your reader. Don't fall into the trap that the 95 percenters fall into. They offer it in a casual manner and practically say... "It's free so take it or leave it."

But what they're really saying is that it's not really worth the bother of downloading it!

What's an effective approach? Sell your freebie! No, not for money...

Sell the benefit of owning your freebie. Sell the value of its contents and how it will improve your reader's lifestyle. Sell the value of owning it with the same passion you show when selling your pay-for products and services.

If you offer it in a casual way, it will be accepted with the same attitude.

The same 95 percenters don't realize that you should also...

5.11. Sell Your Newsletter Subscription

For the same reasons, sell the benefits of subscribing to your newsletter.

A little box in the top left corner whimpering “Subscribe” means nothing. Why should she subscribe to your newsletter? Just to please you?

After all, there are only 90,000 other newsletter publishers pleading with her. And she already has too many dropping into her mailbox every day. Why invite even more email into her life without a good reason?

That’s the key! Don’t offer a take-it-or-leave-it subscription box. Sell her the benefits of subscribing. Sell her the idea that by receiving your valuable information, her business will grow and her lifestyle will improve.

If need be, take her to a separate page and sell the benefits in detail. Build up her expectations so that she’ll recognize your name and newsletter title in her email subject line.

If you just throw it at her with a take-it-or-leave-it attitude, your subscription rate will suffer.

Ken’s Notes...

The Backup Response

Joe brings us to a bigger issue, the concept of the Backup Response. I’ve summarized a bit from MYSS!, and updated my thinking in this area...

For every customer who delivers your MWR, there are 10 visitors who will come close and then reject your offer. But those 10 may hit your Backup Response. Ultimately, you have a good chance to convert a good number of these people into sales.

Develop at least one Backup Response.

Let’s say that your MWR is a direct sale of a $1,000 piece of software. For every person who triggers your MWR and buys directly from the site, there are 10 who waffle, then pass.

Here’s what scares them...

1. What if it’s a scam?
2. What if it doesn’t work?
3. What if they do something with my credit card information?

4. What if it's OK, but I don't like it?
5. And so on, and so on, and so on.

Sure, you've designed your site to head off these doubts. But the more unknown your company and the more expensive your product, the more likely the customer will still have doubts.

No matter why someone turns down your product, it's ultimately based on a lack of trust. Can't blame people for that. These people want your product, but they can't quite jump over the trust hurdle. Don't lose them. Find a way to stay in front of them, to gain their trust.

Even if you're a large, known multinational, customers can't reach out and touch your product. The Web creates a gap that isn't there in a conventional retail store.

Remember, the less well known you are, and the more expensive your product, the more important is your backup.

To get your hesitant prospects to finally jump and deliver your MWR, you must set a Backup Response.

A good Backup Response delivers a benefit to your visitor at a "no-brainer" price (free is best).

It provides you with the opportunity to remind your customer about you and your product again.

It increases your chances of ultimately getting your MWR.

It costs you nothing to make and distribute. It can be automated.

A quality Backup Response Product must also contain excellent content. Here's why...

A quality Backup Response makes your potential customers like and trust you. They feel good about you, confident in your offering.

It develops feelings of obligation. Since they keep getting free, quality stuff from you, when it comes time to buy, it will be from you, not a competitor.

Sooner or later, a healthy percentage of those who trigger your Backup Response will deliver your MWR. Why? Because you're building a quality, long-term, repeated exposure, one-to-one relationship with your customer.

When you finally reach your visitor's comfort level, she buys.

What kind of products fit the above criteria?

Digital products! Products like infoproducts (free reports, newsletters), software trials, webinars, videos, totally free mobile apps that would be of value and interest to your customer. You get the idea.

One special note about "free stuff": You have to sell your free newsletter! If you think that signing up people for your free newsletter is a no-brainer, read the following carefully...

Your measly, quick "gimme-your-address-it's-free" form won't work. There's just too much free stuff on the Internet, and people simply don't need another free newsletter subscription. You're not giving away $100 bills, so you have to sell it!

Review the sales effort for your free newsletter. If you expect people to just give you their email address, you'll be disappointed in the results, especially if your target market is bombarded with free newsletter offers. Sell your backup response.

Think of an email address as a form of currency. Now... get paid in that currency!

5.12. Write Intriguing Joints

Encouraging your reader to click through to another page is one of a web writer's most difficult tasks. You can't force her to. And if your sales message hasn't done its job, she won't want to anyway!

Even though she may be inclined to click through, she may well decide to bookmark your site and return later. But so what? Have you looked at your bookmarks recently? Do you recognize them all?

Offline direct marketers have a similar but less difficult task. They have to encourage their sales-letter-reader to turn the page and continue reading.

And the best-known method for this is to finish the page half way through an interesting sentence. The reader's curiosity is heightened so that she turns the page to finish the "plot." And as a result, continues to read the rest of the message.

You can achieve a similar action on your web page. This call to action is known as a joint.

Now when your visitor reaches the end of a paragraph in your sales copy, an intriguing subheading encourages her to read the next paragraph, and so on down the page.

But what do you do when she finally reaches the bottom of your page? You can't use a subheading to encourage her to click through to your products page, can you?

Sure you can!

In fact, you must -- otherwise you may lose her. But this time you use a joint. And your joint has to intrigue or tease your reader into clicking through to your next page.

A products page is not a joint... It's a back button trigger!

How exactly can you double sales?... is a joint.

Visit our testimonials page... is a turn-off.

Here's how to be sure Gizmo will work for you... is a joint.

There are many ways to write and use a successful joint on your site. If you don't, you risk losing your visitor.

Use your imagination to do everything possible to encourage her to click through by raising her curiosity and self-interest to a level where she just can't resist clicking on that link.

It's either that, or she clicks the back button!

If you need some inspiration, visit the sites of the 5 percenters and see how they do it! And while you're there, discover how to...

5.13. Make Your Guarantee Sell!

You do give a guarantee, don't you? If you don't, your sales will suffer big time. In fact, they'll never get started.

When writing your copy, the main hurdle is to gain the trust of your reader. Offering a credible guarantee is essential to building that trust. But for heaven's sake, don't just state that your product is...

Guaranteed for 30 days

Use the benefits of your guarantee to maximum advantage.

Describe it in your sales message. State it in detail, and in bold type, on your order page. Place it in a box or stand it alone in the center of the page. Make absolutely certain your reader cannot possibly miss it.

If your guarantee is for 12 months and your competitors offer 30 days, tell her. If it's for a lifetime, make a huge point of it!

If it's tucked away, as an afterthought, you may as well forget it. Because your reader certainly will!

Yet no matter how excited your reader is about your product and your guarantee...

5.14. You Must Ask for the Order

Do you know why so many people fail as salespeople? Believe it or not, it's because they don't like to ask for the order!

Why? Because nobody enjoys being rejected, either in sales or in their personal lives.

These salespeople may make the best sales presentation ever and have their prospect all set up for the close. But they ramble on and on and keep on selling, instead of asking the prospect to buy. They're hoping against hope that the prospect will ask if she can buy!

Believe me, it's true. As any salesperson will tell you... asking for the order and getting it are the hardest and most important parts of the selling process.

There are many ways to do it. And there are even techie terms for them such as the assumed close. But I'll tell you my best and most successful close as a salesman. When I sense the time is right, I simply look the prospect in the eye and ask...

"Are you going to buy it?"

Or...

"Have we got a deal?"

Or...

"When would you like to take delivery?"

Then I shut up! If she's agreeable, the sale is made. Here's what I do next. I make the ordering process as quick, seamless, and painless as possible. I answer any possible objections such as delivery times, method of payment, etc., before she asks!

I'm also acutely aware that at this moment she feels a mixture of excitement and relief. She's feeling vulnerable because the adrenaline is beginning to ebb away slightly. So I reassure her, because the tiniest obstacle can undo all the previous hard work.

Why am I telling you all this? Always remember that your sales copy is your salesperson. And the fear of rejection is deeply embedded into our subconscious.

Consider this. Why does an employee agonize for weeks trying to pick up the courage to ask his boss for a raise? After all, the boss can only say yes, or no. He can't kill him (not most bosses, anyway!).

And why would a lovesick teenager be terrified to death about asking the object of his desire for a date?

It's caused by the fear of rejection. We all like to be liked!

Whether you're aware of it or not, this psychological fear reveals itself in many forms. Otherwise, why don't we complain more about poor service? Or the time we waste on some poorly designed websites with frustrating navigation?

So many people just simply don't like to sell. Even on a website, they don't want to appear pushy. Selling is somehow demeaning to them. Let's face it, salespeople are... well... just a little "in your face," aren't they?

But to be successful on the Internet, you must sell your product. Nothing more. Nothing less.

The best way to do that is simple. Ask your reader to buy!

Don't expect your reader to break her neck to buy from you. She won't. You have to sell to her.

If you ask her to consider making a purchase, she won't. If you don't tell and show her how to order, she won't. And if you don't give her a very good reason to order from you now, she won't.

We all suffer from inertia. It's human nature to procrastinate. And when it comes to spending hard-earned cash, your reader is probably looking for a reason not to buy! No matter how impressed she is by your product.

If you allow her time to think about it, there's a chance she'll never return. Or she'll misplace your URL and never find you again. So you must do everything in your power to persuade her to buy now.

This is your critical call to action, the climax of your whole presentation. The ordering process has to be as easy and as foolproof as possible.

First, ask for the order! Don't make a vague suggestion or pussyfoot around. Simply say to her, "Order the Gizmo now."

Then tell her how to order because she may not have done this before. Show her how to order. And don't be afraid of "talking down" to her.

Give her different options to order — toll-free phone, secure online order form, etc. And if you're "selling" a free trial, regard it as a "credit sale" and use exactly the same selling techniques.

Otherwise the fear of rejection will become a reality... Click!

To persuade her to actually place her order, you have to...

5.15. Reassure, Reassure, Reassure

When was the last time you made a purchase on the Internet? Not just a major purchase, any purchase. How did you feel just before you pressed the BUY NOW! button?

A little nervous? Hesitant? Even afraid? Perhaps you went as far as to ask someone for advice. It's OK. You're not alone. After all, you were placing your complete trust in a faceless individual. Someone who had asked you to give your hard-earned cash to a stranger!

Well, just think back to that moment and imagine your reader on your order page. Now you know how she feels as she approaches the dreaded Buy button. She needs reassurance that her decision to buy is the correct one...

So pile on the reassurance, before and after the sale. Restate the benefits. Show her your USP.

Paint her a mental picture of her improved lifestyle after the purchase. Spell out your guarantee.

Put a virtual arm round her shoulder and convince her of your honesty and credibility.

Remind her of your testimonials. And how your product had helped so many other people in her situation.

Ken's Notes...

The Guarantee

Testimonials and guarantees are the two most important "special techniques" for getting the sale. I've summarized a bit from MYSS!, and updated my thinking on this for you. Let's discuss the "perfect guarantee."

Remember your potential customer's mindset? No matter how great you know your product is, she's skeptical.

Everyone has bought a bad product at one time or another. So anyone over the age of 8 has learned to be careful. No one wants to make a mistake. Especially not an expensive mistake — the more expensive your product, the more important is your guarantee.

So let your customer know that you're willing to take the risk for her — that's how much you believe in the product.

Let me repeat — take the risk off your visitor's back and put it all onto your own shoulders. How? Guarantee your product!

First, let's talk attitude.

Don't pitch your guarantee as a "Full Refund If Not Satisfied" or "Money Back If You're Not Happy" kind of thing. That's negative.

Instead, offer "A Free 30-Day Trial" or "A Risk-Free Trial Download." It's the same thing, expressed in positive terms.

"Examine it, try it, use it for a full 30 days without risk." Now you're inviting them to try your product. You're not warning them about it.

Did I say "30 days"? No!

Make the guarantee as long as practical. Longer trial periods allow customers to "get used to" your product. You also get inertia working for you, instead of against you. People forget.

I don't know about you, but when I see a 30-day guarantee on a product, I wonder about the product. And when I get it, I'm very aware that I only have 30 days to be sure. So I actually test it and make a decision immediately.

With a one-year guarantee, I don't exactly enter the deadline in my day planner — "End of guarantee period, decide by now, Ken." No, I just kind of forget all about it.

I took a subscription to a newsletter that offered a full guarantee for a full year after subscribing. Each month that I received the newsletter, it reminded me that it wasn't very good. However, I put off asking for my money back — "I'll do it later." After all, don't you put off unpleasant stuff? Then guess what? I forgot all about it!

Now, I'm not saying to offer a one-year guarantee to reduce refund requests if you have a bad product. No, just that it's good business to offer a one-year guarantee. You'll get more sales and fewer returns. It's the best way to offer your guarantee for your great product.

Your guarantee must be specific, not vague. It must prove your commitment and confidence.

It must also be iron-clad. No weaseling. No ifs, ands, buts, or any legalese... "Just ask and we'll refund your money. Period. No questions asked."

Make your reader think, “Gosh, I’d have to be brain-dead not to try this. What do I have to lose?”

Whoops! I was just about to wrap this section up when I thought about this potential worry... “Geez, I could go broke with people taking advantage of my guarantee.”

Yes, you could... if you have a lousy product.

The fact is that, despite all media indications to the contrary, people are honest. Give them a good product and they won’t want to punish you. The few scammers who take advantage aren’t worth worrying about. Just honor your commitment.

Don’t make the mistake of stopping when she orders.

Immediately after she buys, email her with the reassurance that her decision was the right one. Because if you don’t, she may get cold feet and ask for a refund. It’s called “Buyer’s Remorse,” yet another trait of human nature.

So a few days after the sale, email her with a genuine inquiry. Ask if she’s happy with it. And if not, why not? Encourage feedback.

Impressed with your interest, she’ll be ready to add something very valuable to your sales toolbox... her testimonial! And boy can you find a use for that!

Always follow up in a professional and caring manner. Show a genuine interest in her and make her feel very special. Because she is! She’s no longer a visitor... she’s a customer!

Zero or weak follow-up will cost you dearly in missed sales. But an intelligent, caring and professional follow-up will make extra sales. Remember that the selling doesn’t stop when you get the order!

Phew! We’ve covered almost all of the essential fundamentals... only one labor of love to complete...

5.16. Cut and Slash

At last! You’re done! Your sales message stands proudly on the page. Bright-eyed, bushy-tailed and raring to go. In a few minutes, you can upload your new sales page, relax, and watch those orders come pouring in.

Get out of that hammock! There’s still some work to do. And it’s crucial that you don’t duck out of it. No matter how good you think it is, I can guarantee one thing... It can be a lot better!

So after you've finished writing your sales copy, you have to go back over it and butcher everything that doesn't contribute to your MWR.

Cut out the verbiage. Slash redundant words, sentences and even whole paragraphs. "Cut and slash" adds power and persuasion to your message.

It's so difficult to do this. It can be very painful to delete that really clever phrase you came up with. Or change that really catchy subheading that you were so proud of. No choice...

Do it! Be ruthless. It's your livelihood that's at stake here. Not your ego!

Rewrite, rewrite, and rewrite again, until it's razor sharp and completely focused on achieving your MWR.

Then read it out loud. Better yet, have someone else read it to you. If it doesn't sound right... If she hesitates or stumbles over a word... If it doesn't ring true... Rewrite it again!

Successful writing is all about rewriting. So put it away for as long as you can bear — the longer the better... 2 days, or 2 weeks, it has to be done. Then come back to it. Print it out and read it with a large red pen in your hand.

At this point, you'll see that a very strange thing has happened...

It's different from what you remember! Somehow it's rewritten itself! Or at least that's how it appears.

Now it contains lots of redundant words. And some of those tight sentences have slackened off a bit. Your headline doesn't look quite as persuasive as it did before. And some of those crisp, short paragraphs seem to have grown in size!

Don't worry. This supernatural event happens to every writer. Fortunately, there's a known cure for it. Not an easy one, for sure, but a cure all the same. Just rewrite it again! Then let it loose on the Web and marvel at how it sells!

Congratulations! You're now an official graduate of Copywriting 101 and 102. Ready for your Masters Degree?

6. Write to Fit the Big Picture

“All the world is a store... Every one of us is trying to transfer an idea from his own head into some other brain.”

- Arthur Brisbane

Ever check your Google Analytics or other log files? People visit you from all over the world. Here comes someone from the U.S.A., followed by a Brit.

Your potential customers are not just nationally diverse. They're men and women, of all kinds of personalities, mindsets and backgrounds.

How do you write for them all? You can't. But you can do two things. Write for your “ideal” customer and avoid offending everyone else.

Your three big considerations are personality, sex and national traits. Let's start with personality...

6.1. Adjust to Your Reader's Personality Type

“There's nothing as strange as folk.

- Old English Saying

Copywriting 101 and 102 have established this firmly in your brain: You must figure out what your customer wants from you. Never assume.

Now just as important... Don't ever guess how she will react to your sales message.

Does this sound familiar? “Write your web copy as if you're talking to a friend.” It makes sense. The Internet is a less formal environment than most.

However, your friend probably shares a similar personality to you, with similar interests, opinions and even hobbies. Hey, that's why you're friends! As a result, you already know instinctively how to talk to your friend. But unless you're extremely careful, the person you're speaking to on your website may not find your writing style and tone of voice appealing. In fact, she may even find it a big turn-off!

Why? Because we're all different.

We have different needs and wants. We think differently. Most important of all, we all have different personalities! The complexities of human nature dictate that of all the people who read your sales message, no two personalities will be identical.

Who hasn't experienced the disastrous consequences of a personality clash? No matter what's said, those two personalities will never see eye-to-eye. No matter how much they "discuss" the point, the chemistry between the two is wrong!

So it's reasonable to assume that your unique personality will not be compatible with all of your potential customers. And if you suffer a personality clash with these people, your chances of making a sale are... Zero!

But how can they possibly know your personality, if they never meet you? Ah, but they do meet you.

Whatever you write on your website, your emails, or your newsletter, your personality is imprinted into every word, sentence and phrase.

- Your sales message becomes your voice.
- Your words and phrases can mirror your lifestyle and background.
- Your page layout and design show your degree of professionalism.
- Your writing style reflects your attitude toward your reader and your business.

And between the lines, your reader picks up on your personality.

How many times have you visited a website and become annoyed with some of the language used? Words like "my friend" can be a complete turn-off to some people, and yet be perfectly acceptable to others. And even small typos and grammatical errors can infuriate certain visitors, and be easily forgiven by others.

A casual, laid-back writing style may well endear you to many readers, yet appear unprofessional and overly friendly to the rest. In other words, there's a clash of personalities!

To be successful, you must adapt the personality of your writing to that of your reader. You have to choose a writing style that avoids too many clashes with your readers. In short, you have to talk their language!

How on earth can you write to suit the infinite number of different personalities? You can't. But you can write to suit your "ideal" customer's personality type! And you'll be relieved to learn that there are only four of them.

To write copy that sells, adapt your writing style to appeal to the dominant personality type of your target market! And ignore the rest.

One point to remember... you can't please everyone. But you can plan on talking the same language as the majority of potential customers in your targeted group.

Don't worry, we're not about to delve into the mysteries of psychology or academic Freudian analysis! It's a whole lot easier than it sounds. So let's look at some everyday examples of the four different personality types.

I'm sure you'll recognize them...

Ken's Notes...

Read the following four personality types, at least three times. Absorb this material. Inhale it. Understand it. Learning to write to the dominant personality type of your target market is one of the really big keys to writing words that sell.

6.1.1. The Boss

Suppose that you've been successfully using a sophisticated method of investing in options. You write an e-book revealing your little known, sure-fire formula and build a website to sell it.

You can't sell to everyone, and you know that your strategies are beyond the average investor's abilities. So you carefully research your potential market and decide to target the following... professional people with high disposable incomes, bank managers, financial analysts, CEOs, senior managers and self-employed stock investors.

Change over. Now, let's assume you're an easy-going, laid-back type of person. You enjoy the company of other people and you mix well. You like to socialize, and a noisy party is your idea of a fun way to spend an evening.

What do you think would happen if you used your own voice, reflecting your personality, to open your website sales message like this...

Hi Friend,

I'm Harry Jackson and I'm about to let you in on a well-kept secret. So grab a cup of coffee and sit back because the secrets I'm about to reveal to you will make you so much profit it will blow your mind. You're about to discover how to make a huge killing in options by applying my secret option picking formula.

Yours in profits,
Harry

Uh-oh. Here comes that mouse again... click! Talk about a clash of personalities!

Now I'm not, by any stretch of the imagination, saying your target customer doesn't enjoy meeting people, socializing or going to parties. But when you're pitching your product on her screen, in her office and in her business environment, she expects — no, demands — you play by her rules.

And a laid back attitude like that does not fit in with her rules of conducting business. She expects things to be done her way! So whatever you do...

Don't invade her personal space. Don't get too chummy. Be sharp — make a professional impression.

Here's a snapshot of the Boss personality type...

- Strong willed. Thinks she has the answer to everything. Expects results.
- Thrives on challenge. Not afraid of risk. Competitive.
- Decisive. Likes to make things happen. Delegates everything but major decisions.
- Hates being hustled. Doesn't need the details. Just give her the pros and cons and the bottom line.
- Impatient with less able people. Hates sloppiness. Respects efficiency.

The Boss personality isn't restricted to people who've "arrived" at the top. It's the type of personality that helps less senior people to get there! They're ambitious decision-makers who know what they want and how to get it.

So if you're pitching your sales message to this type of person...

- Avoid even a hint of hype and give her plenty of substantiated facts.
- Speak to her at her level.
- Include the pros and cons. She'll respect you for it. And...
- Present your offer in a totally professional and business-like manner. For example...

Dear Options Investor,

You and I both know there is no proven way to guarantee profits from speculating in options.

But if you'll give me just a few minutes of your time, I'll show you exactly how I've beat this fascinating game. And I'll show you how to do it, too.

There are only 500 (audited) copies of this strategy, because I still take eggs from this golden goose. So if you're at all interested in options, please read on now...

My name is Harold Jackson, and for the past two years I have...

A sales message like that speaks her language!

And when you write the rest of your message, make sure it's concise and fast-moving. That's what she thrives on. Keep up the pace right through to the climax of your message. If you begin to dawdle or wander from the subject, she'll quickly become impatient and leave!

Just read those bulleted points again, and see if the sales message identifies with each of her personality traits. More importantly, see if it clashes in any way with her personality. If it does, change it!

Now you may still be thinking that in your particular case, it's difficult to determine the personality type of your "ideal" customer. Just remember... you can't sell to everyone.

Ignore this important element in your marketing and your sales results will never be as successful as they could be. So examine your chosen target market exhaustively, and determine the personality type of the greatest number of possible customers in that market.

For instance, if you're selling social media marketing seminar seats at $3,000 per participant, your target market will consist of many types. Most people, wishing to build or improve their online business, will be interested in such a seminar.

Your "ideal" customer will not just be people who can afford $3,000. The biggest percentage of targeted customers will be those who are prepared to spend such a large amount of money!

Now you can get into the mindset of those people and make a reasonable assessment of their type of personality. And speak to them in their language!

How about after the sale, you wonder?

If your customer is a different personality type to you, you may lose the sale soon after... unless you use your knowledge of her mindset to assess her reaction to her purchase.

This is a dangerous time. She could cancel at any time for a number of seemingly insignificant reasons.

Wait a minute. The reasons are only insignificant to those marketers who fail to foresee these problems and don't take the customer's personality type into account...

After the sale...

Bearing in mind that the Boss is used to being treated as such, ensure she has a contact email address or phone number to use for queries and problems.

Make sure they're answered immediately, because she expects it! If you don't do so, she'll take it personally and demand a refund. Then she'll run straight to your competitor!

6.1.2. The Empathizer

The Empathizer is easy-going, outwardly friendly, and considerate to others. Being good listeners, they make good counselors and teachers, and are at home in customer service positions. They don't like to rock the boat, in case it upsets those around them.

And they prefer being part of a team rather than standing out from the crowd. That's why they're regarded by most as slow, steady and methodical, preferring to assimilate lots of facts before making a decision.

Here are some traits that will help you identify Empathizers and understand their personality type.

- Prefer stability. Slow to change. Avoid risk-taking.
- Turned off by "hard sell." Enjoy the friendly sales approach. Respond best to "soft sell," low-key sales messages.
- Like everything explained in methodical step-by-step detail. Top quality after-sales support is essential.
- Need to think things over, rather than jumping in. Need lots of reassurance to help them decide.
- Are loyal customers, preferring to deal with someone who earned their trust.

If you're selling to Empathizers, you'll achieve best results by employing a friendly me-to-you sales message. Soft sell is essential, as is offering lots of reassurance, proven facts, and a strong guarantee. Testimonials will be welcomed, along with proof of excellent after-sales-service.

You may, however, need to encourage her frequent return in order to assess the pros and cons. If you have her email address, several low-key, friendly autoresponders will help make her mind up.

But once she has purchased from you, she'll be a good prospect for long-term back-end sales, testimonials, and referrals.

So a headline like...

"Ace Bumper Stickers Have Increased My Sales By 176%," States Delighted Store Owner

...will be more likely to attract her attention than...

These Bumper Stickers Will Explode Your Profits

After the sale...

Empathizers love consistency, and don't like change!

Send a follow-up message, asking if everything is up and running smoothly. They'll regard this as a friendly gesture.

A follow-up also gives you the opportunity to help her handle any changes that her purchase may have caused. This is especially important if you've persuaded an Empathizer to upgrade or substitute an existing product with yours.

Remember that by being resistant to change, she may have a negative attitude to your product as soon as she encounters even a minor problem.

So keep in touch!

6.1.3. The Mixer

Mixers usually achieve success as salespeople or entertainers. If your "ideal" customer is a socializer, the Internet is the perfect place to present your sales message.

The Mixer likes to be liked, enjoys being part of the crowd, and revels in talking about his favorite subject, himself!

His main characteristics are...

- Expressive. Outgoing. Enthusiastic. Optimistic.
- Interested in new ideas. Believes that work should be fun.
- Prefers a fast pace. Easily bored. Short attention span. Impulsive.
- Enjoys recognition from his friends, his work colleagues and his boss. Enjoys the status and prestige of owning the newest, latest, most modern, etc.
- Makes decisions based on emotion rather than logic.

In your pitch to a Mixer, your sales copy should be confident and enthusiastic. He'll respond better to a faster-paced message that appeals to his positive emotions.

Too much detail will bore him, but a little carefully chosen humor will endear you to him. Write in a warm and informal style. Convince him that you're primarily interested in him, rather than you.

Focus on the prestige of owning your product and how it will improve his image and status. He'll be impressed by a polished presentation, especially if he's in the sales profession, and he'll be swayed by testimonials from well-known people or companies.

As a result, he'll respond better to polished sales copy like...

Imagine the luxury holidays you could enjoy when you join the select band of high earners in our MLM company. Maybe you'll choose to buy that foreign executive car you've always promised yourself. Or how about an expensive beach house overlooking a...

Rather than this...

This high earnings system, gradually perfected over 5 years of continuous improvement, will enable you to increase your present income by at least 200%. The extra income you enjoy will help you buy all the luxuries you and your family desire.

Compare the Mixer's list of characteristics above with the two pieces of sales copy. Judge for yourself which one you believe would appeal most to his personality type.

After the sale...

Got the sale? Great! Now head off problems...

The Mixer's natural tendency toward buying on impulse means he's the most likely to suffer from buyer's remorse. And if left untreated, buyer's remorse will quickly degenerate into the fatal condition known as "Gimme-my-money-back."

Unless you really enjoy giving refunds, take extra steps to reassure this customer and convince him that he's made the right decision. There are many ways to do this.

Immediately after the sale is made, send an autoresponder email congratulating him on his decision and reinforcing the benefits he'll enjoy from his purchase.

Several days later send another, asking for feedback on your product. Then, a little while after that, send a third email. First, ask him if he's completely satisfied, and second, for a testimonial. If he gives you one, he's hardly likely to ask for a refund two weeks later!

6.1.4. The Ponderer

Ponderers are in their element as engineers, computer programmers, statisticians and the like. They're usually regarded as serious, dependable and somewhat introverted people who thrive on details even in sociable conversations about everyday events!

Sales people find Ponderers particularly difficult. And you can understand why when you see the Ponderer's strengths and weaknesses...

- Loves efficiency. Organized and hates disorganization. Cautious and hard-working.
- Strives for accuracy in him-/herself and others. Meticulous to a fault.
- Highly logical and thrives on details, details and more details. Plans everything. Looks at the long-term picture, rather than short-term benefit.
- Makes decisions based on logic, not emotions.
- Frugal and cost-conscious.

When writing copy for Ponderers, you must know your stuff. If you don't, they'll be on to you in a flash.

They dislike being rushed. So move at a reasonable pace, and avoid verbiage. They're extremely suspicious of "sales types" so avoid hard sell at all costs. And make sure your site navigation is up to scratch. Ponderers hate disorganization of any kind.

They base their decisions on logic, so present your claims on facts alone. Emphasize reliability, accuracy, and cost benefits rather than the emotional benefits of prestige and image.

Every fact and detail must be backed up with proof or logic, so your price should be justified in terms of value and cost effectiveness.

The Ponderer is very likely to spot any disadvantages with your product or service. More to the point, he'll specifically look for them. So discuss any known drawbacks openly and overcome his possible objections on the spot.

Always make it easy for him to obtain more information, such as an FAQ page or a support email address. More than likely, he'll use it.

Sales copy like this will appeal to a Ponderer...

This week, a survey published by Blackman Surveys Inc. revealed that in January 2015, 35.6 million domain names were not in use. This compares with 24.7 million in January 2010.

By using the Ace URL Search software, it has been demonstrated that you can make profits of between $230,000 and $627,000 a year from this unused domain name real estate. In fact, over...

Whereas this would leave him distinctly unimpressed...

Ace URL Search software can earn you in excess of $600,000 a year by cashing in on the millions of unused domain names available for FREE. Find just 10 a day and you will make a cool $12,000 clear profit every week!!

If you believe a Ponderer is difficult before the sale...

After the sale

An effective way to keep your Ponderer happy is to ask him for feedback on your product's performance. Ask him for specifics like...

Did it...? How did...? What do you...? And if he highlights a specific problem to which you may not have an easy answer, he'll be especially pleased if you simply ask him... "What specifically would you like me to do?" More than likely, he'll tell you!

Ken's Notes...

Remember when I suggested that you read the four personality types three times to really absorb the material? Please do. Go back and read it again... please.

The only way you can really accomplish the correct perspective for your site is by knowing your customer.

To understand these four types, categorize your friends, colleagues, etc., accordingly. Think about how you deal with them and how you should deal with them.

A good understanding of the different personalities will help you write effective copy for your targeted audience. You must speak their language.

6.2. Don't Be a Gender Offender

“Standing in the middle of the road is very dangerous:
you get knocked down by traffic from both sides.”

- Margaret Thatcher

The last thing I want to do is enter into a debate on the need for political correctness. Yet from a writer's point of view, it can sometimes present problems.

Simply put...

Avoid alienating half of your readers and losing half of your customers by staying away from too much emphasis on either the masculine or feminine. Sometimes, I admit, this may be easier said than done, especially the “he/she” problem.

Be careful before you reflexively use words like “salesman” or “chairman” — these will offend some target markets. But “salesperson” and “chairperson” will offend others. Choose the term that will be most invisible (i.e., not noticed) to your target.

If you have trouble coming to terms with a balancing act, whether you're male or female, you're destined to lose a lot of business. And it's not only your female readers who will object.

Many of your male readers will feel just as strongly, if the balance is tipped against them. They will simply click away to another site!

The secret, if there is one, is to create an even balance.

6.3. Writing for Women

“The society of women is the element of good manners.”

- Johann Wolfgang von Goethe

Many male and many female Internet marketers seem unaware of the enormous consumer power of the female population. Even in cases where the man wishes to make a purchase, it's the woman in his life who will probably make the final decision!

Any car salesperson, for instance, will tell you who makes the final decision about which model to buy. In 90% of cases, it's the woman. So the sales pitch is heavily slanted towards her needs. It's not about political correctness — it's about business.

Conversely, on the Web, some marketers make no attempt to cater to the specific needs of their female readers. A big mistake!

True, it's impossible to write for the whole of the female market (or male, as well). But it is possible to write your sales copy with the specific needs and wants of your female readers in mind. And your sales will show the difference. How powerful are women?

Well, considering they control 75% of all household spending and they own one-third of businesses in the U.S.A., that's very powerful.

So why is it necessary to write sales copy with their needs in mind? Because their buying habits are different to most men.

Ken's Notes...

Women control the purse strings. The following might be a bit stereotypical, and it may over-generalize a tad, but this "woman thumbnail" is useful for guys to keep in mind (women know this stuff)...

Women are more people- and relationship-oriented than men. They spend less time on the Internet and are more security- and privacy-conscious. They're over-busy with both job and family, so don't have patience for complexity and gizmos. They thrive on warm, personal support.

If you give it some thought, you'll realize how important women are to your online business.

But don't "fake it" and pander... if you become your customer, you won't have to pretend. It will come naturally.

To drive this important point home, we use the feminine pronoun in most cases when we talk about "the customer" in this book.

Many women are constantly juggling their time between working and looking after a home and family. They tend to spend less time surfing around. They're in a hurry to find what they want.

Consequently, they're more interested in the content and information that you provide than anything else. With this in mind, make sure your site is gimmick-free and easy to navigate.

Women are more concerned about privacy and security issues than are men. And they're also less likely to buy because of doubts over security than their male counterparts.

So place your privacy statement on a prominent part of your page and make a big issue of how secure your credit transactions are.

Women are much less likely to buy on impulse than are men. They place more emphasis on whether they can trust the site owner. Relationships are important. The already identified trend for relationship-building opportunities on the Internet will only become stronger. Female readers want to know as much as they can before they make a decision.

Overlooking, or more dangerous still, ignoring the specific needs of your women readers will simply drive them away to your competitors!

6.4. Write for the Global Market

“The limits of my language mean the limits of my world.”
- Ludwig Wittgenstein

The Internet’s biggest benefit is that it offers a global marketplace to sell our wares.

Why then do so many U.S. websites direct their sales messages to American markets? And why are so many UK marketers seemingly hell-bent on ignoring the fact that “foreigners” do not understand everything British?

My observations are absolutely true, I’m afraid. The sooner we all wake up to it, the better. We have to “think without borders” when we sell on the Web.

Let’s start with the three biggies...

6.4.1. Watch Your Language

English is a universal language. But the variations of spelling, punctuation and grammar can make a serious impact on the credibility of your business, unless you’re very careful.

If English is not your native language and you’re writing to the English-speaking marketplace, even the occasional error with your grammar can create the impression that you’re unprofessional. Your visitors don’t know that it’s your second or third language.

The answer? Ask an American or Brit to read your copy before you publish it. OK. OK. You can also ask an Australian, a New Zealander, etc.

The point is that you have your copy proofread by someone whose native language is English!

As for spelling, my opinions here may cause you to throw your hands up in despair, if you live outside of the USA!

American English is widely understood around the world. For example, color is recognized as an American word. The Brit spelling of colour might be considered a typo by those whose second language is American English.

“Centre” is British and “center” is American and so on. It makes a great deal of sense to use an American spellchecker when writing your copy. You’re doing this service for not only American readers, but for readers all around the world.

So swallow your national ego and spell to sell! Which brings us to the thorny subject of culture...

6.4.2. Avoid a Culture Clash

Nobody can write copy to perfectly suit the huge diversity of international cultures. But you should do your utmost to level the playing field. (And just to illustrate the point, the phrase “level the playing field” may be a totally unfamiliar term to you.)

Try to avoid using references to, say, national politicians, sports stars or TV celebrities. I constantly read references to “Oprah” on U.S. sites. I can only assume they mean Oprah Winfrey, a household name in the States, who only appears on daytime TV in the UK. And what if I don’t watch daytime TV? The whole meaning of the reference is lost!

The same goes for regional humor. Sorry, humour. However you spell it, it’s “iffy.” You have to be a gifted writer to use it in your sales copy without alienating some of your readers. But local jokes are deadly — most readers just won’t get it. Besides, they visit you to be informed, not entertained. They watch Oprah for that!

Local slang is a no-no if you want to be taken seriously by your potential customers. Even if they understand it, they’ll judge you unprofessional for using it. Since your “foreign” readers won’t know what on earth you’re talking about, why use it at all?

Sometimes I come across a newsletter that ends with “See ya next week,” and it makes my toes curl (irritates me). Imagine the confusion of a reader who doesn’t know the meaning of that “ya!”

The Internet is a friendly medium. But you have to know where to draw the line between being friendly and appearing unprofessional. Or, even worst... unintelligible!

6.4.3. Translate Very Much Proper

If you decide to translate your sales copy into one or more foreign languages, this could make a dramatic impact on your sales, either positive or negative!

Using software to translate your message may seem like a quick and easy fix. But it could seriously backfire on you.

“Hey, look at this. One click and my whole site is translated into German. Isn’t that cool?” It’s cool alright. So cool you could catch a bad cold!

A robot may do an acceptable translation of technical data or factual information.

But how can a word-for-word translation of your sales message possibly retain the passion, feeling and one-to-one relationship you've worked so hard to instill?

If you do choose to have your site translated, use a human translation service that employs someone whose first language is the one you wish your copy to be translated into, who understands what sales copy is all about, and who also has some first-hand knowledge of your type of product or marketplace.

The right translator could make all the difference. Let's face it. If it's not translated professionally, how can you check it?

OK. Let's move ahead to the "advanced nitty-gritty"...

7. Thrive or Dive With Your USP

“What we see depends mainly on what we look for.”

– John Lubbock

The question of the hour, day, week, month, of all time...

Why should I buy your product from your company?

This question raises more questions. What’s the big reason that I should buy your product? What’s the big deal about your business? In fact, what makes you think anyone should do business with you?

Steady now, this isn’t as easy to answer as you may think.

What’s that? You’ve got a fantastic, planet-changing product? Big deal. So do lots of other people!

You offer a great service and first-class backup? Yeah, yeah. I’ve heard that one before! So what else is new?

You’ve been in business for 30 years? Hey, don’t make me laugh. So is my uncle Jack, and he’s almost bankrupt!

What’s that? You’re the top expert in your field? Fine, but you still haven’t answered my question... “Why should I buy your product from your company?”

Painful, isn’t it? But it’s so brutally true. And the pain will never subside until you’re brave enough to address this fundamental question. If I come to your website...

7.1. What’s in It for Me?

Why should I buy your product when I can just as easily buy from so many other businesses on the Web? What makes you think you’re so special? In fact, why should I even bother?

Now, if you have something that’s truly, totally unique, then I may well be interested. Assuming, of course, that it will be of benefit to me. And you can convince me of your honesty, credibility and reliability.

Scratching your head a little? Well that’s a good sign. Many online business owners simply don’t do the hard thinking needed to answer this all-important question. In fact, they’ve never even thought about it!

They're struggling, of course, along with the other 95 percenters!

Unfortunately, you probably do not have a product that's truly and totally unique. You're not alone. More than likely, you're in the same position as most other online businesses. What position?

You're probably in danger of being suffocated by the abundance of other people selling similar or even identical products and services to the same market as yours.

That's what competition is all about. It's a business reality. If there were no competition, we'd all be millionaires!

So how do you persuade your reader to buy from you? How do you convince her that, if she buys from you, she'll be making the best decision? Do you get rid of the competition?

The first thing you absolutely must do is...

7.2. Stand Out From the Crowd

In the seething, tangled mass of the Internet, you must at least appear to be different. And that difference, whether real or apparent, has to be immediately noticeable to your reader.

Not halfway down your home page. Not even 30 seconds after she begins reading your copy, but immediately.

How? Identify your Unique Selling Proposition (USP) and thrust it up front for everyone to see. You have to make it so obvious to your reader that she can't miss it. No matter how distracted or disinterested she may be.

And the most effective way to announce it is in...

- your opening headline,
- your opening paragraph(s),
- your sales copy, and
- every appropriate spot you can find to place it throughout your website.

A powerful USP will be the difference between your business becoming a winner vs. a has-been... a money-spinner vs. a millstone... or a champion in the crowd of envious onlookers vs. another frustrated wannabe.

A well-thought out and powerful USP will hurl you above the crowd of the 95 percenters who are all furiously running nowhere at ground level.

What's next then?

7.3. Start Right!

Some key advice for beginning. Prepare yourself properly for this task. The results of your creation are going to determine the success or failure of your whole marketing program.

If you attempt this exercise in a half-hearted manner, you will fail. And your degree of success will be determined more by your attitude than anything else.

Here's what to do...

Prepare your mindset so that you're able to concentrate on nothing else. Sit down at your desk and clear your mind of all distractions. Switch off your computer. Kick the dog out of your office. Disconnect the phone, and put pen to paper!

Remember pen and paper? Don't use a word processor. It will slow you down and interrupt your thinking process.

As you write, leave two or three spaces between each line of writing. This will make it a whole lot easier for you to make changes to your "script" when you go back over it.

OK. Now the first thing you must do is...

7.4. Analyze Your Product

You know it intimately. All features and benefits of your product are firmly ingrained on your mind. However, if you're really serious about increasing your business, you must take the time to really analyze it.

Even if it's a book you've written yourself and the digital ink is still wet, the truth is you're probably too close to your product to be objective or even critical.

It's like being married for 10 years. You love your spouse, but somehow you've started taking his good points for granted! So you must look at your product from a second angle... from your prospective customer's point of view.

So read through your testimonials and write down the benefits your past customers have gained.

Look at the Meta Description in your web pages. You spent a lot of time and effort producing those. Take each one and expand it into a benefit.

Add all other benefits that you know of, whether important or minor.

OK, that's your benefit list. Now do the same for features...

List every single feature of your product and your business. Yes, your business, too. Your USP may turn out to be something unique about your business.

Please don't skimp on your feature list. It's such a key point to your success that it's worth persevering until you've exhausted every single feature you can think of! If need be, fill one, two or three pages. Just keep on writing those features.

Now it's time for the fun and the hard work. This is what separates the winners from the losers, and you from the competition. You're about to do something that your competitors have never even thought about: Consider your product from your customer's standpoint.

Until now, you've probably been advised to put yourself in your reader's shoes. But the drawback with this method is that you're only guessing. They're your answers, not your customer's.

Your success is a very serious business. Not a guessing game. So you're about to do something much, much more productive. Instead of her shoes, you're about to get into the opposite end of your customer's anatomy...

7.5. Get Into Her Mind

"Get into her what?" Yes, I know, it's spooky, isn't it? Just humor me and I'll show you a neat trick that will have you thinking just like your prospective customer in two shakes of a copywriter's begging bowl.

Start by making a list of all the people you know. (If that's a long list, then it serves you right for being so popular!) Now select from that list the one person whom you feel fits the image of your ideal customer.

Picture her there before you, half-listening to what you have to say. Because you know her, you can see her face and hear her actual voice when she speaks to you. It's important to forget the milling crowd of other readers out there. It's just her and you and nobody else. Concentrate just on her.

Next read out each feature and benefit (from your lists above) to her. Imagine her asking you these questions...

- What will that do for me?
- How will it improve my lifestyle?
- How will I benefit in the long term?
- How will that benefit help my family?

And the cruncher question... What's in it for me?

Sheesh! What a friend. "Me, me, me!" She doesn't want to talk about you at all!

Let me summarize that barrage of rude questions into a single technique, one that's guaranteed to reveal some amazingly profitable answers. Ready to start?

Read each feature and benefit to her out loud. For each one, "hear" her asking...

7.6. "So What?"

Then you answer it! And remember, you're talking directly to her. Use as many words as it takes to give a complete and benefit-laden reply. The editing comes later.

For instance, if you read her this feature, your conversation may well go something like this...

You: "Miracle Software is 3X faster than the software you're using now."
(Satisfied smirk)

Her: "So what?"

You: "Er, hmm... well... you'll spend less time promoting your website." (Know-it-all grin.)

Her: "So what?"

You: "You'll have more time to spare."

Her: (Incredulous look.) "So what?"

You: "Well, you'll have 2 hours more each day to spend with your family."

Her: "So what?"

You: "Your children will feel closer to you and remember that you're there for them."

Her: "So wh.... hey, that's great! That's more like it."

Your customer can't ask "So what?" to that. Can you? Now that's a powerful benefit! Write it down in two places... beside the relevant feature that "belongs" to it and in your overgrowing benefit list.

See what's happening here? You're not guessing her answers. You're putting her under the spotlight and interrogating her! (The above exercise was just the beginning of our "So What?" tutorial. More specific SWAT? examples later on.)

Hey, don't stop now. You're on a roll. Focus on her firmly in your mind's eye. Keep thinking like she thinks. Keep pushing the process until it's impossible for her to ask you that blasted question!

Hey, don't stop now. You're on a roll. Focus on her firmly in your mind's eye. Keep thinking like she thinks. Keep pushing the process until it's impossible for her to ask you that blasted question!

Now for some hard and profitable work... repeat the question and answer process for every feature and every benefit on both lists. No skimping on this. No cutting corners. No "making do" with incomplete answers.

Remember to do it for your benefit list, too. The So What? technique will either make the benefit even stronger, or convert what was really a feature into a true benefit.

As I said earlier, no making do! "Making do" is exactly what your competitors are doing. They're the 95% crowd who simply guess what their visitors want. That's why they continue to flounder as small fish in the big pond!

Want even more accurate answers? Take this one stage further and actually...

7.7. Interrogate Your Customer

That's right. Why not dispense with the imagination test. And dispense with your friend-as-customer. Get real!

Sit down face-to-face with your customer. Or call her on the phone. Ask the same So What? question, over and over again. Let her answer for herself!

That's if you have the courage, of course. I can promise that you'll get some surprising, yet very profitable answers.

After you do this with several customers, you'll find that your list of benefits has substantially multiplied. And so has your list of what needs to be improved. You probably even have new features and benefits to add to your lists!

Keep in mind that the sole objective of the exercise is to produce the longest list of benefits as possible. Here's the rationale...

In order to persuade your reader to buy from you rather than from someone else, you have to offer benefits, benefits, and even more benefits. It's impossible to offer her too many!

Stick with it and do the best job you possibly can. From this list, you'll identify your USP.

Believe me, the more work you put into it now, the greater your rewards will be.

OK. You have a long list of benefits to offer your reader, so now what do you do? Well, from here on in...

7.8. It Starts Getting Easier

We're on the "home stretch." From your So What? list, identify the biggest single benefit you can possibly offer your potential customer. Examine it from every angle. Most importantly, examine it from where she sits.

Ken's Notes...

Your customers can help with this part, too. After you've asked her "So What?" ask two more questions...

1. "What's the most important thing that our product does for you?" Ask her to choose the single most important benefit from your list.
2. Why did she choose you and your product? Was there something unique about either or both?

Keeping your customer firmly in your mind, and with her needs at the forefront of your thoughts, rewrite that #1 Benefit several different ways. Incorporate her biggest need into your benefit.

Give her exactly what she wants. Blend that with what makes you unique. Answer the question, "Why you?"

Now sharpen your wording. Crystallize it. Hone it to perfection. And congratulate yourself... you just identified your USP!

With this one action, you've stepped away from the mob and hoisted a large sign above your business. Picture it as a bright neon sign, which will draw your customer into your copy like a moth to a flame. The sign illuminates the #1 benefit and the #1 reason she needs to buy from you!

Just before you finalize your USP, let's do one last check...

7.9. Give Yourself a Second Opinion

Here's a little known but effective way to come up with your product's biggest benefit. Ask your customer this question, "If I had supernatural powers to grant your wish, what is the greatest single benefit that you could possibly ask for from this product?"

Write down her answer, no matter how long or detailed it may be. Once again, condense it. Crystallize it. Hone it. And voilà, a fresh USP!

Compare this to the USP you previously came up with. Is it stronger? Is it weaker? Choose the best USP of the two. Better yet, combine the best points of each into an even stronger USP.

Now you'll really stand out from the crowd. And when your visitor reads your sales copy, she no longer asks that painful question we all know (i.e., "Why should I do business with you?"). Your compelling answer will be staring her in the face!

What's that? You wish you could ask that genie to write your USP? Let me guess... identifying a feature/benefit that sets your product apart is challenging. No worries, you're not alone.

That's always the initial reaction for readers who have an "undifferentiated" kind of product. It just means that it's time to...

7.10. Get Creative If You're Not Unique

Let me get this straight. You sell a commodity kind of product, something like tissue paper or potatoes or bread. At first glance, that seems to be a problem. There's nothing very unique about those products. After all, bread is bread, right?

What can you do to change that? Create a difference! By that, I mean that you have to find a feature to differentiate yourself.

For example...

Bloggs Bread is free of animal fats... but so is everyone else's.

Jackson's Bread, the vegetarian's choice... now that's a USP.

If all you do is run with this slogan, you're really just trying to trick a few folks. But if you decide to enhance your whole product to deliver the most nutritious, wholesome and tasty bread ever... well, that's a pretty good start.

If you don't differentiate a commodity, you're doomed to play the "low price and lower profits" race-to-the-bottom game.

Take a close look around you. Odds are that most of your competitors don't understand the vital importance of a strong USP. That's why they're struggling and fighting with each other to catch the same fish, in the same pond, with the same bait.

Many competitors who do realize the value of a USP find it too much like hard work to grapple with the subject. Or they haven't yet discovered how to identify their own USP correctly. But you know better than that now, don't you?

You're not fishing for customers. So don't be content to simply dangle a line in the huge Internet pond and live in hope. Don't be just another fisherman...

Be a persuader.

Be savvy enough to realize that it's words that bring in the customers, not the hype and screaming promises being used by the others as bait. In order to be a successful persuader, you must stand apart from the crowd. And to do that, you need a powerful and persuasive USP.

Your USP will lift you and your business head and shoulders above the mob, and bring customers flocking to your order page.

Your USP is the only reason to keep them returning to your website.

Your USP is the only motivation that they have to recommend you to their friends and business colleagues.

And once you identify your USP, you'll be amazed how much it will help you to focus on your marketing message, and really sharpen up your sales message.

Now for the next step, where the fun begins...

7.11. If You've Got It, Flaunt It!

Once you've identified your USP, condense it into a one or two line sales message and use it in every piece of copy you write. Display it in everything you do. Never let it escape the attention of those exposed to your sales materials.

- Integrate it into your logo.
- Make it a prominent feature in all your advertising.
- Include it in your email and newsletter article sig file.
- Use it in your website headlines.
- Use it offline on your business cards, your letterhead and invoices.

Whenever you write about your business, make sure your reader never fails to see it. Just because your competitors have no USP, it doesn't mean that it's difficult to create one. It's not!

OK, so it's not something you can achieve in a few seconds. A powerful USP takes imagination, time and concentration!

Your USP is a benefit that your competitors don't offer, can't offer, or haven't thought about offering. And the bigger the benefit, the greater your results will be.

So create the best USP and be recognized! Be successful!

8. The Power of Headlines

“The beginning is the most important part of the work.”

- Plato

Ever think about why headlines are called headlines? They are literally lines that head a body of text.

How important are headlines? Well, have you ever seen a body without a head?

Master headline-making if you want to do well on the Internet. You'll use headlines everywhere... on all of your web pages, as the subjects of your emails, in your newsletter articles, ads and even your email signature file.

Obvious? Well, you'd think so. But if it's that obvious, why are so many headless monsters roaming the Internet?

Your headline is the only device you have to flag down your targeted reader, grab her attention and start the selling process. Banners won't do it. Dancing babies will either bemuse or enrage.

And your beautifully crafted logo may swell your chest with heart-pulsating pride, but it will tell your visitor absolutely nothing!

So if you insist on placing your ego-stroking logo in the most prominent place at the top of your web page, then go ahead. If you're totally convinced it will improve your reader's quality of life and give her everything she wants, then do it.

That will work as long as your name is Google. If it's not, tuck a small logo in the upper left, then make a headline that gets noticed and resonates with your market.

If your target customer doesn't stop to read your headline, she sure as heck won't bother to delve into your copy to find out what you have to say. If nobody bothers to read your sales message, then you've simply wasted your time. Right? Even if you give away $100 bills, she'll never read far enough to find out!

Now it's no good shaking your head, because that, I'm afraid, is the harsh reality of selling on the Internet.

OK. Let's find out how your headline can affect the success or failure of your marketing. It starts by writing your headline for your "ideal" customer.

The very first thing you must do is...

8.1. Imagine Her Mindset

Fix your visitor firmly in your mind. Yes again... always, actually. She may be visiting your site from an obscurely described hyperlink. Or she may have clicked through out of half-hearted curiosity from a newsletter recommendation.

She's used to being bombarded with exaggerated claims, and over-hyped ads. She's been shouted at so much that she's numb to them!

And she certainly hasn't rushed to visit you, absolutely convinced that you have the very thing she needs. In fact, her mind may well be elsewhere as she waits for your page to load.

She's in a hurry and is only prepared to give you a couple of seconds to grab her attention with something of benefit to her.

So what do you think she'll do if she's greeted with your great big logo! Or a "Welcome to" message followed by a page of dense text with no headings? Or perhaps there's an unfathomable clutter of linking options.

She won't take the time to figure it all out in some desperate hope that it may be of real benefit to her. Not with so many other sites to choose from. Click!

Only an attention-grabbing, persuasive, and benefit-laden opening headline will make her stick around a bit longer...

- A persuasive headline that promises to solve her problem and give her exactly what she wants.
- An interesting headline that gives her a reason to read, or scan, your copy.
- An intriguing headline that creates the desire to learn more.
- A headline that awakens a little voice in her head that says "hmmm... there may be something in this for me."

Does the following sound familiar? "8 out of 10 visitors merely scan your page."

Sheesh! Not very neighborly, is it? All that hard work you've put in to carry your super-important message to the waiting masses, and they just scan it? What's new? We all do it. You do too, right?

Do you read every single word, every line, every paragraph of every website you visit... of every newsletter that arrives in your inbox? You know, the ones you can't remember subscribing to?

Hmmm, I didn't think so. Why should your reader act any differently?

Now, how about this?

Do you, first of all, read the top message, the opening headline, to see whom it's from? Do you then scan the opening paragraphs, and subheadings near the beginning, to see if there's anything of benefit to you? If you do, do you read more?

If nothing hits your fancy, your index finger is a micro-second from the click! But first, you might scan the navigation, just to see if anything there meets a need. (Even the navigation is an opportunity for very tight, mini-headlines.)

What about newsletters? When you receive a newsletter with no list of content headlines, do you read the newsletter at all? You probably don't bother reading articles with "vague" headlines like "Be a Winner" or "Solve Your Problems Now."

I've got a feeling you never give them a second glance. And what about all those newsletter ads? Do you read every single one from start to finish? If, and that's a big if, your eyes don't skip right past the ads, do you scan the first few words (the headline) of each one until one arouses your curiosity enough to read the whole message?

Sure you do! Everyone does. The point is...

Any sales effort, from a full website to a tiny newsletter ad, that doesn't have an effective headline is like a store on Main Street without a giant promotional sign. It's invisible among the neon glow of the competition. The rushing traffic drives right on by, totally oblivious to the fact that the store may well be selling the cheapest and best gizmos in town!

So is this the best way to stop you?

8.2. Sex, SEX, SEX!

Well, yes... that headline might get your reader's attention for a split micro-second... before she continues roaring past you. A great headline does much more than slow down your reader.

Whatever superhighway she's hurtling along, your headline has to convince her to take your "off ramp" and look around for a while. In other words, a great opening headline (subheadings, too) pulls her deeper into your site.

How do you create a persuasive headline?

Well, many Web "experts" tell us that writing headlines is easy. And they're right. It's very easy to write a "so-so" headline.

They tell us that all you have to do is offer a big benefit, and fill it with power words. As a result, we see these types of headline everywhere...

Earn $100,000 in 30 days. AMAZING NEW FREE system draws 5,000 VISITORS A DAY to your website like a GIANT MAGNET!

Now that's easy! It's also totally useless! Don't get me wrong. Even a poor headline will attract a low percentage of readers. They may not be the right type of readers, but readers just the same. So sure... if it's just raw numbers you want, go ahead and shout... SEX, SEX, SEX!

However, I'm afraid your readers are going to be very disappointed when they discover you're selling a domain name registration service. And very annoyed for wasting their time!

What you want to attract are the maximum number of targeted people who could be interested in buying your product or service. You need a headline that sells the promise of a benefit to your reader.

And writing a headline that sells is a completely different ball game. It's not difficult. Neither is it easy. Let's face it. Nothing's difficult once you know how.

It just takes a little time, lots of effort and knowledge. So let's get started...

8.3. Cloners Have Taken Over!

Before we start, here's a news flash! There's no such beast as a successful cloned headline solution. Judging by the high number of cloned headlines bombarding us every day, many people seem to disagree.

What's a cloned headline? It's generic copywriting gone mad!

Here's one you must have seen...

How to write a KILLER AD that SELLS LIKE CRAZY!!!!!!

And here's its genetic clone...

101 KILLER HEADLINES that will send your Traffic Counter CRAZY!!!!!!

I only wish I had the money to swamp the Internet with headlines like this...

How to Write KILLER HEADLINES GUARANTEED
To KILL Your Reader's Enthusiasm! Simply CLONE
This Ad and Watch Your Profits BOMB!!!!!!

How does that song go? “When will they ever learn?”

A common trait on the Internet is for someone to copy something that “seems” to work. Then someone else copies him and so it goes on and on and on. It’s like a never-ending chain letter! Each person in the chain is seemingly desperate to clone it and send it on to thousands of others.

Judging by the appalling quality of some of these clones, it seems to me that they’re trying to get rid of it as fast as possible! I despair. I truly do! It’s a pity really. If you stop to think about it for a moment, it’s all so obvious....

8.4. Why Cloning Fails

Please read this carefully and re-read it, until you fully understand the significance of why cloned writing fails. It’s something that very few people understand.

If you plagiarize a successful headline, it will fail. Amen to that! If you adapt a successful headline, it will probably fail! Unless you fully understand what you’re doing!

Because a headline that proves to be exceptionally successful and fits well with one product can be a dismal failure with yours. If you try adapting someone else’s successful headline to suit your own particular product, you’ll be frustrated and confused by the poor results.

And copywriting books that simply analyze successful headlines and sales letters are of little help when it comes to writing your own copy.

Want to know why?

OK. Here’s the lowdown...

For your headline to be successful, it has to appeal directly to the specific needs of your targeted “ideal” customer. And to do that, you have to understand her mindset.

You have to understand not just what she needs, but also exactly what she wants. Don’t worry. We’ll examine the subject of mindset, in depth, shortly.

Let’s say you’re selling software that creates beautiful professional cartoons in less than a minute, compared to the normal 30.

If you decide to target professional cartoonists, your headline has to offer a benefit, or promise, that appeals directly to your “ideal” customer. And offer her something she specifically wants.

In this case, you may decide that the biggest benefit to your professional cartoonist is the opportunity to work faster and make more profit.

So your headline could read something like this...

Cartoonists, Now You Can Create
Any Cartoon of Your Choice in Just 60 Seconds and Dramatically
Improve Your Profits

Let's imagine that this headline proves to be so successful that it sells your software in the thousands. At this point, you realize that any newbie can use your software to produce cute cartoons for themselves. So you decide to target young moms who will be able to entertain their young children for hours.

The features of your software are ease of use and speed. But the biggest benefit to professional cartoonists is the extra profit margins, hardly a winning sales appeal to use on your busy mom!

Now if, as you may have done in the past, you adapt the same successful headline for a different "ideal" customer without considering her mindset and different needs and wants, you could end up with this...

Busy Moms, Now You Can Draw
Any Cartoon of Your Choice
To Entertain the Kids

That will attract some busy moms. If they're interested in drawing cartoons. But you want to attract the maximum number possible. This headline won't achieve it because it has no emotional appeal. Nor does it offer anything of specific benefit to her.

So you have to promise a benefit that will appeal directly to her specific needs and give her something that she wants. And what does a harassed busy mom want?

Think like her. Put yourself into her mindset and imagine her day with the kids. Does she want to spend all her time entertaining the children? Or do you agree that she really wants something that will help her kids to entertain themselves so she can get on with her busy schedule?

So how about...

Busy Moms, Your Kids Will Entertain Themselves
For Hours and Hours With The Wizard Cartoon Creator.
Absolute Magic!

See the difference? Same product. But each headline offers a different specific benefit directed at your two different targeted markets.

To create a successful headline, study your specific “ideal” customer and promise to give her exactly what she really wants. Understand her mindset.

What’s next on the agenda? The most important types of headlines to use, the ones that are most likely to achieve maximum success for you on the Internet...

8.5. The 7 Most Successful Types of Headlines

Here are my favorite seven types of headlines. If you study Ken’s sites, you’ll see that most of his headlines fall into one of these seven.

1) Promise a Major Benefit

This is the most widely used, and by far the most successful type of headline ever used. Notice the use of the word “major.” To be effective as a selling tool, it must contain a significant benefit.

The real beauty of this type of headline is that it gives you the perfect opportunity to boast your USP. Right up front. Like this...

FREE Domain Hosting for a Whole Year

Now that headline will leave no doubt in your reader’s mind about how it will benefit her. And it also tells her how different you are to all the other hosting services because it telegraphs your USP within the first half second.

2) Ask a Question

Ask a question that suggests you have the answer. This creates curiosity, tempting your reader to read further.

Just like for headline #1, the answer to the question must be a major benefit, not some incidental one. Don’t tease with small stuff. For instance, this headline digs at a major problem (and therefore implies a major benefit to come!)

Do You Waste Hours of Your Valuable Time Answering Email?

You’re highlighting her problem (wasting time), and suggesting you can solve it. But to do that, she must read further. If this is her problem, she will read further.

Did you just ask, “What if email is not a problem for her?” That’s OK. She’s not a potential customer anyway. You’re only interested in attracting potential buyers!

3) Offer a Solution to a Problem

Sometimes known as the “pain and gain” headline, and a variation of the “ask a question” headline.

The solution to the problem is your big benefit. And by offering your reader a solution, she automatically recognizes it or the headline crystallizes her problem. Like this...

Ban-It Email Filter Keeps
Spam OUT of Your Mailbox and Puts Time Back INTO Your Day

The benefit? Time saved. The feature? Eliminating spam.

4) Cite a Testimonial

A powerful testimonial is worth its weight in gold at any time. In a headline, it can attract a lot of attention because it enables the reader to identify and relate to a real human being.

The higher the status of the testimonial writer, the greater the impact will be. But it has to be totally believable. Otherwise, it will have a negative effect and totally destroy your credibility.

Again as in all types of headlines, your #1 benefit should form the basis of the testimonial. Here's an ultimate example...

“Ken, Your New Email Manager Has Added
2 Hours to Each of My Days...
Which Amounts to $20,000 per Day!”

Heck of a headline. You simply have to read the opening paragraph, right? Here's the next sentence...

OK, 2 hours of your time may not be worth $20,000 like it is for Bill Gates. But it's still valuable, right?

Boy, is this site off to a roaring start!

5) Give a Warning

This is simply a warning to the reader that there may be serious consequences in not reading your message. As an attention-grabber, it hits the reader hard! She believes it would be foolish not to read what you have to say. It creates anxiety. The anxiety grows if she doesn't stay to read more.

For instance...

Before Buying Any Affiliate Software,
You Should Read These 6 Important Facts

Now if you were about to buy affiliate software, would you ignore this message? This one's a bit subtle-nasty... after all, you're looking like a good guy/gal, doing this service... when you're actually riveting your reader to the screen with insecurity.

6) Flag Your Target Customer

This is self-explanatory. It's incorporated into many other types of headline. The flag identifies the visitor you want to stop and pay a visit. It's so simple, even obvious, that many marketers never seem to even think of using it. Example...

Gardeners, The Dig-Eze Digging Machine
Will Save You Hours of Back-Breaking Work

The word "Gardeners" immediately picks out your target customer. When she spots it, a bell rings in her mind and she identifies with it right away... "That's me!" She knows that your message is written specifically for her.

Last, but not least...

7) News Announcement

Everyone is interested in the latest news. That's why we read the news and watch CNN. We like to be up-to-date and on the ball. Write your headline in the style of a newspaper or magazine headline. Your major benefit is, of course, contained in the news you're announcing. Like this...

Latest Digi-Mix Software Creates Major
Breakthrough in Music Sampler Industry
That Cuts Time-to-Market Down by 50%

The benefit? Time to market is reduced by 50%. Any prospective customer for this kind of product simply can't afford to pass this.

Now quickly re-read the 7 types of headlines. Notice a common thread? Yes.

They are all "You" messages. Not "Me" messages. And what's a Me message? Well, there are lots of them about. Here's one...

Our Gizmos Are the Industry Leaders

Yawn.

Just to clarify a bit. If you think that types #4 and #7 are not “You” messages, re-read them and imagine the impact. They’re third party statements that still address your reader’s self-interest by implying a major benefit for her.

They all answer her question, “What’s in it for me?”

So when you’re creating your headline, sales message or advertisement, bear this painful point firmly in mind...

The only people interested in you, your company, or your product’s technical merits are you and your Mom! The cold reality is that absolutely nobody else is even remotely interested.

Here’s the nitty-gritty, in the words of your customers...

“We will only give you our time or our money if you give us something that will either benefit us or solve our problem. Give us exactly what we want, and we’ll return the favor. So talk about us, OK? Not you!”

It’s a cruel world, isn’t it?

8.6. Practice Writing Headlines

A successful publication used to land in tens of millions of mailboxes, every month. It was successful because it always gave its readers exactly what they wanted, month after month, year after year, decade after decade.

Through very intensive and expensive research, the publication was constantly aware of the changing needs of its readership. And those needs were successfully provided for with crisp, sharp copy and precisely targeted headlines. It was called “The Readers Digest.”

Huh? Have you looked at a past issue lately? I mean really looked. The front cover (and just about every page) is an Aladdin’s cave of punchy, skillfully honed headlines!

Here’s a brief selection...

- Is your car ready for winter?
- Lose 2 inches in 30 days.
- Is our benefits system out of control?
- Can these pills make you live longer?

You can find thousands of examples like these every day on the front of popular magazines, written by people who know exactly what their readers want. These word mechanics have perfected the art of crystallizing a message into a brief yet focused headline.

Try it the next time you browse a rack of magazines or newspapers. You'll be surprised at how much you can learn from these masters of brevity. Rarely will you find any ambiguity. No "cute" teasers. No "catchy" meaningless words just to trick you into reading the "story."

These people are the masters of their craft. They've developed the rare skill of using short, sharp headlines, which immediately telegraph to their targeted reader that this is for you! You need to read this!

Boy, do these guys know what they're doing! And imagine, you can benefit from their knowledge just by picking up a magazine! No charge!

Now let's look at some of the headline writing techniques that the professionals use. Use these and make the difference between writing a "good" headline and an "excellent" one...

8.7. 7 Pro Tips for Headline Writing

The pros always follow these key "headline tips of the trade." Amateurs unwittingly violate them repeatedly, sometimes all seven in a single headline! Here they are...

1) Don't Try to Be Clever or Cute

Your headline has to qualify your reader! It must immediately pick out your "ideal" customer from the "not interested" ones. And to achieve that, your headline must be relevant to your sales message.

To determine if a message is relevant, your website visitor must be able to clearly understand it.

Closely related to this is the rule, "Never mislead." If your headline tricks a non-targeted reader to continue more deeply, you've only delayed her departure. You're no closer to getting the sale... but you are closer to getting her really, really mad.

2) Use Professional Architecture

OK. OK. You want to build a website, not a house! Same thing. Because an attractive house has more appeal than a functional "box."

So to attract the maximum attention to your message, use some or all of these methods that the professional copywriters use to give your headline that extra touch of "noticeability"...

- Use a larger font size for your headlines (H1 for your opening headline, H2 and H3 for subheadings). The subheading font sizes should be larger than that of the body copy.
- Bolden your headlines (this may not be necessary depending on the font and the size).
- Use a Capital Letter at the Beginning of Each Word Longer Than 3 Characters in your opening headline. It adds an element of importance to your statement. It's not necessary to begin each word in your subheading with a capital letter... some feel it's better if you don't. Also capitalize any pronoun or verb three characters or shorter.
- Use quotes. No, I don't mean... "We'll fight them on the beaches." I mean putting little curly bits at the "beginning and end" of your headline. It gives the appearance of someone being quoted. And adds substantially to the importance of your announcement.
- Don't end a headline with a period. Your headline is not the end of your message. It's supposed to lead your reader's eye smoothly into the next part of your message.
- Break your headline into a number of lines if it's long.

A Long Headline Stretching Right Across Your Web Page Has No Impact

It becomes invisible among the rest of the text and "busy-ness" on the page.

But a Bunch of Words Catches The Eye in Much the Same Way As a Graphic or Picture

Note that the lines "force" your reader to read down the page and into your message. Keep the number of characters per line small so your headline won't wrap, even if the reader zooms text size to 150% on her browser.

- Try using a different font color (not bright green or pink, though).

Imaginative use of color can add significantly to the impact of your headline and to the overall appearance of your web pages. Just because you've kicked those banners off your site, it doesn't mean that it has to look like a lawyer's contract!

Those 7 simple "architecture" pointers will transform this...

It's true. Now you can earn $100 a day while surfing the Internet.

Into this...

It's True...
Now You Can Earn $100 a Day
While Surfing the Internet

Better? It should be. Top professionals have been using these proven techniques for decades to transform a good headline into an excellent one.

3) Highlight Imaginatively

Highlighted words in your sales message act in the same way as a subheading. They pull the ever-scanning eyes into a short meaningful message. But be very careful not to overdo it because too much emphasis is the same as none at all!

Don't use underlines. Because underlines mean hyperlinks! And constant clicking on underlined words that do nothing but stare back at you are a sure-fire way to infuriate your reader to the point of posting about you on social media!

One more thing... too much highlighting and coloring makes it look like a "hype site." Even though you're just trying to show what's important, even though you're sincere, you'll look like a sideshow barker. So use this sparingly.

4) A Long Headline That Says Something Is More Effective Than a Short Headline That Says Little or Nothing

The objective of your headline is to grab your reader's attention, raise her interest and curiosity, and move her closer to the sale. So don't be afraid of using a long headline... as long as it does its intended job.

Short headlines are ideal for posters. On the Web, take more space. But over three lines is getting a tad too long. Yes, it's true. In general, say anything in a smaller number of words if you can. If you can't, take as much space as you need but not more!

5) Keep It Positive

Avoid using negatives in your headline. It sets the wrong tone. Remember...

Your visitor is scanning. So she's picking out some words, and missing others. Negatives in your headline may convey the exact opposite of the message you wish to convey. For instance...

You Need No Experience to Learn HTML

This can be very easily read like this to a scanner...

You Need Experience to Learn HTML

Yes, it's a small point. But wait 'til you need spectacles. I said...“But wait 'til you need spectacles.”

Let's push the example a bit more. This is better, although there's still a negative tone...

You Don't Need Any Experience to Learn HTML

And this is best...

ANYONE Can Learn HTML and That Includes YOU!

And that brings up the next pro tip...

6) Always Be Positive

To get your reader into a positive mindset, write in a positive tone. Your headline has to lift her. It must motivate her to read through your headline and into your sales message. Using negatives will hardly achieve that. For instance, this example...

Don't Waste Money on Biz Opp Scams

... is negative. And anyway, I'm not that stupid! Or maybe I am. So it may well bring back memories of a bad experience.

Even if I'm not that dumb, it still introduces a downbeat atmosphere to your page. And it gets worse...

Your headline will lead your reader seamlessly into your sales message. So if you have a negative headline, how is the opening to your sales message going to sound?

Even more negative!

Yes I know. After a couple of sentences, your message will turn upbeat and positive. That's when you explain how to avoid the problem. But meanwhile, the damage has been done. Many have left the site, and others are starting with a negative mindset. That's one, two, three click!

So why risk it when it's so easy to write in a positive way? Like this...

How to Make Money With A Blue Chip Business Opportunity

7) Turn Hyperlinks Into Headlines

Huh? Hyperlinks are underlined and blue, right? They stand out right? So the eye goes to them. Scanners stop here.

On some websites, you'd think some hyperlinks were specifically designed not to be clicked upon! They are so bland and boring, it's a miracle anyone ever clicks on them.

Again, it all goes back to your visitor's mindset. She's at your website. She finds your home page interesting enough to scan, maybe even read. Now what's she looking for? A signpost pointing to more information! And links are signposts, no matter where they are. So put good benefit-focused copy into your links. Treat them like mini-headlines.

Can you see why your hyperlinks should be treated as mini-headlines? As your visitor scans the page, every one of your links should be acting as a headline. Create sufficient interest to encourage your reader to click on them. Offer the promise of yet more good things to come.

Convey the persuasive message of "Click Me!"

Ken's Notes...

Great concepts! Here are my own top 11 tips for making headlines that work...

1. Use strong active verbs (e.g., slash, chop, stagger, etc.) to create powerful headlines with emotional impact... headlines that push your customer's hottest buttons!
2. Never accept your first stab at a headline -- keep improving until it's as good as it can be. I'll twiddle with it countless times before I "nail it."
3. Stir an emotion. Get the reader excited or fearful or protective.
4. Use the present tense, or the imperative. It's far more emphatic. Use "you."
5. Use words, preferably short, that create images or pictures.
6. The headline must stand on its own. Your visitor must understand where the following text is going.
7. Don't care about what non-targets think of your headline. Don't write for them -- you're not after them. Focus on your target.
8. Ask a question that begs to be answered.
9. Make only believable promises -- don't get carried away with hype.
10. Use upper and lower case letters (typical title-style), NOT ALL CAPS (screams).
11. Maintain a consistent color and size for all your headlines.

8.8. How and When Headlines Get Born

Let's help you understand the thinking behind writing headlines. An insight into the psychology of this important subject will substantially strengthen your writing abilities.

Imagine the typical working day of a professional copywriter. There he is in the sun, sitting on the porch overlooking a beautiful, calm, blue lagoon.

Between refreshing cold beers, he applies his gifted talents to the job in hand, and writes a fantastic piece of sales copy in two hours. Then he puts away his 50-year-old Remington typewriter, sits back and waits for his big fat check.

At least, that's what it's like that in the movies. If only! The reality is that writing successful copy is 90% hard work.

And every copywriter knows how it feels to beaver away for hours, even days, translating his ideas into a successful sales message. Writing, rewriting, sharpening and polishing, the efforts repeat until he feels that the copy has the energy to stand on its own feet and sell.

And all copywriters have been guilty, at one time or another, of leaving the headline until the last moment. After all, the headline is only a few words!

Wrong. The results always suffer. Yes, you may come up with a good headline. But it's not your very best, because after you've finished writing your sales message your creative energy is spent. The passion you felt at the start of your project is drained.

And your initial enthusiasm has been diluted.

So you relax and take your eye off the ball. Uh, oh! The result is a headline that's only a shadow of the potent sales message you've just written.

And yet we already know that 80% of your visitors will only read your headline. It's by far the key element in your sales message. Doesn't it make more sense to put 80% of your time and effort into creating those few words?

These words will be scanned by 80% of your readers! So...

8.9. Write Your Headline First

I know Ken writes his headlines a bit later in the process, so let me tell you when I write my headlines and why, from my point of view.

I write copy only after an exhaustive examination of the product. I list features, benefits, and the USP. I know my "ideal" customer, how to find her and how to think about her mindset.

From now on, I will never have as much knowledge, excitement and passion about the product as I do right now!

I think of it this way...

When is the best time to tell your friend about a terrific idea you have? Tomorrow? Next week? It's right now, of course!

Hey, you can't keep an idea like that bottled up, can you? You want to rush over there and get it off your chest right now! And when you tell him about your brilliant idea, do you simply explain it? Not on your life. You sell it!

And even if your words are not the most descriptive you've ever used, it doesn't seem to matter. Because your enthusiasm and excitement bubble over into your "sales pitch." The fiery passion in your belly infects your friend so much that he nods his head and becomes infected himself.

But how would you sound if you waited until next week and strolled over to tell him the same story, about the same idea? A little less enthusiastic, right? Rather less passionate? And, a lot less convincing, right? You bet! That's why I write my headlines first.

It has to hit my reader in the heart or the head. It has to stir an emotion or make a promise. And I have to catch her eye with something she wants. Not something she needs.

What's the difference? She needs bread to live. But she may want to eat out every day. She needs a dress for work. But she may want a designer business suit.

So my headline should create excitement and instantly paint a positive picture in her mind. A picture of something she wants. And the best time to inject these feelings into my headline is when I'm feeling this way myself. And when are those feelings most intense? Exactly, just before I write my sales message!

But believe it or not, it gets even better! I have everything fresh in my mind. I've examined all the features, benefits, and product information. As a result, I can write the most persuasive headlines possible. Then something magical happens! I now find it a hundred times easier to write my sales message!

How? Simple. My headline sets the "theme" for my main copy. The passion of my headline sets the "mood" of my message.

And because everything I want to tell my reader is fresh in my mind, my own mindset is positive. I can't wait to get my message across to my reader. So my sales message practically writes itself!

That's the power of the mind, working for me... and for you, I hope! So just swim with the current and turn that power into something magical!

Don't close your mind to this simple concept. If successful copywriters use it, why keep on trying your old way? Just do it!

Ken's Notes...

Well, dear reader, I hope you've learned as much about headlines as I have. I've always written my headlines at the end of my first draft (see my comments in the next section). But I'm certainly going to give this approach a shot.

It makes sense to write them when you're fresh and excited. And by writing them first, the opening headline and subheadings can be used to flesh out where you're going with your site and tell your story ahead of time.

Use these seven pro tips for writing headlines. Refer to them when you're stuck for a great headline. I'm sure that one of the seven will spark an idea! And finally...

Never call it quits until you're satisfied that you simply cannot make a headline any better.

Once you've done that hard thinking, that creative and exciting part, what's left is to simply fill in good benefit-focused copy and to tweak any necessary small refinements in the headlines to ensure a good fit with the copy.

Makes good sense. If it works well, I'll stick with this new way to write copy. If it's not what I hope, here's how I do things now...

The Process

When to write a headline is probably more of a personal preference.

I only do the headlines after I've written most of the first draft of the copy, before I polish it. My process kind of goes like this...

1. Develop or position our product for web sales. Prepare the list of features and benefits.
2. Identify the target market. Prepare thumbnail sketches. Decide upon the personality type.
3. Factor in offline marketing. How will online and offline help each other?
4. Check out the competition. Evaluate products and copy on their sites.

5. Determine our site goals. Set and get the MWR and backup response. Set up other functions, such as branding or customer support.
6. Set up the design and factor-in usability. Establish the look and feel, develop the navigation structure and build in usability.
7. Write the opening paragraph. This is probably the single hardest task. Our site has high conversion rates. But I'm still not happy with any of our products' opening paragraphs. I still stop at them and say, "Geez, I could do better than that."
8. Lay out the pathway of the copy. Identify my route for getting the sale.
9. Write a good chunk of the main "selling" copy. Don't worry about typos or getting it perfect. Just let it fly. Once I have a good bit of copy done and it starts to take shape...
10. I start working on headlines and joints. Joints are the key phrases that pull the reader from one page to the next. And they divide my copy up into digestible pieces. That's why I start writing headlines now. I'll be watching now to make sure that my headlines also form a mini-outline of the entire copy.
11. Polish the copy and keep improving the headlines until they simply can't be made any better. Sweat this. It makes all the difference.
12. Read it out loud. Fix what sticks or sounds hollow.
13. Ask my wife to read it out loud. Fix again.
14. Send to key employees and a few customers for opinions. Revise again.
15. Do usability testing (we do this for more than just the copy). Do a final revision.
16. Go live.

One last bit of detail about the process itself...

First, I literally surround myself with a thesaurus, a book of similes, and a book of quotes. I have a bunch of other neat and weird reference books (outlined in Automatic Response Words), but these are the basics.

Second, I drill the MWR into my brain. From here on in, everything that I do is geared towards convincing my visitor to deliver my MWR. So the MWR is the first thing that I finalize.

Yes, I start at the end. Otherwise, how do I know where I'm going?

Only then do I write the opening paragraph, my big gun, as I call it. Then I flesh out the opening page with sales copy. I may add headlines at this stage, if inspiration strikes, but it's not my main focus yet. Finally, I finish that all-important opening page with a "first try" at a joint that pulls the customer to the next page.

Or, more recently, I incorporate all this into a single, longer page that ends in a link to the order page.

I use a Mac outliner (software), but a word processor will do. I underline what will appear as links on the page. I insert notes about ideas for graphics in the appropriate places. But we don't do the HTML yet. That comes last.

Now it's time for the fun page, the closer. I build an irresistible offer and a crystal- clear call to action into the MWR closer page. Then I do the same for the backup response.

Phew! First draft is done.

At this point, I start to sweat on the headlines, dividing each page into tasty bites, with a headline serving as the appetizer. And I focus, too, on my joints at the end of each page. They must pull the reader through to the next page.

After this, the hard work starts... polish, polish, and polish.

9. How to Read a Mindset

“Imagination is more important than knowledge.”

- Albert Einstein

In selling, mindset can be described this way... it's how a potential customer's in-built attitudes, instincts and prejudices make her react to your sales presentation.

Read that again, because it's important. In other words, our decision to buy or not to buy depends on the “mood” we're in, and how our minds react to how we're being sold as much as what we're being told!

OK. We covered mindset earlier, briefly. Now it's time for an in-depth examination of the concept. Suppose that your mind is set on buying a bright yellow 2-seater roadster. A lesser salesperson will write you off without trying if he doesn't have what you want.

Now let's say he determines that your mindset was really to feel the excitement of the wind in your hair and to dream of the open road. He may be successful trying to sell you his dark blue 5-seater convertible, in that case.

To understand the mindset of your reader...

- Anticipate her objections.
- Identify her specific needs.
- Find out what she really wants.
- Offer a solution to her problems.

And you'd do all this before you write a single word of sales copy!

Relax. This isn't hocus-pocus. It's real. So stick with me!

Once you grasp the principles of this awesomely powerful concept, your online sales will rev up faster than you ever dreamed possible. You'll start writing sales copy and marketing materials that your reader believes were written specifically for her. Because they are written specifically for her!

You'll begin writing copy confidently and passionately. Your readers will find your web content absorbing, motivating and credible. And by understanding and applying this principle of mindset, you'll gain a natural insight into writing.

Imagine that you were talking face-to-face with your potential customer. Wouldn't you find it a lot easier to sell her your product if you knew what she was thinking about your presentation? If you had the ability to read her mindset, wouldn't it be a whole lot simpler to sell to her by overcoming her objections before they arose? And if you knew exactly what she wanted from a product like yours, don't you feel you'd be in a much stronger position to meet her needs?

Top-producing professional salespeople achieve their high volumes by "reading" their prospect. They've learned how to pick up almost invisible signals of body language and speech mannerisms. They ask carefully loaded questions, which help them assess their prospect's lifestyle, background, family and social circumstances.

The salesperson's casual, friendly and informal style is, in reality, a finely tuned radio beacon. He's constantly asking carefully disguised questions, and listening to the answers coming back.

His antenna is relentlessly filtering out the background noise and tuning in to his customer's real needs. But more importantly, he's discovering what his customer really wants! Then he provides it.

Naturally, you can't see your potential customer on the Internet (not yet!). And you're not working one-to-one. So it's harder to do. But it is doable.

Before you can do it, however, you have to know...

9.1. The Difference Between Needs and Wants

Consider the following scenario. A woman is "just looking" at an exercise machine in a store. Now she may say to the salesperson that she needs a machine to lose weight, so she can become healthier! But she may actually want to lose weight to wear more glamorous clothes, look more attractive and be admired by her friends.

So the professional salesperson will skillfully ask the right questions and determine her mindset. Then find out what she really wants. Once he knows that, he'll stress the benefits of how his machine will...

- Take pounds off her hips, reduce her waist measurement and trim her thighs.
- Improve her complexion.
- Make her feel fitter and healthier.
- Make her slimmer and feel more attractive!

In other words, he delivers exactly what she wants!

It's the same machine. And it does the same as the exercise machines sold by his competitors. But his competitors only offered her what she needed, instead of what she really wanted!

She may buy what she thinks she needs with her logic. However, she's much more likely to buy what she wants when you appeal to her emotions!

Grasp this difference and burn it into your brain!

Now you know the secret to selling, on and offline. Find a need. Determine the want. And offer the solution to satisfy that want!

You do that by taking the time and making the effort to understand your reader's mindset at the very moment she's reading your sales message. It only takes a little patience and the determination to learn how. So let's get back to our salesperson again...

How does he read his customer's mindset? Well, the successful sales professional skillfully invites objections.

What? Won't that kill the sale?

Nope. Just the opposite. By bringing objections out in to the open, it gives him the opportunity to answer and overcome them. He knows it's the unanswered question that kills the sale!

In any sales situation, whether it's face-to-face or reading a sales message, we all have objections of one sort or another. And sometimes we're not clear what our objection really is.

That's why we come up with stock phrases like: "Let me think about it." Or: "It seems great. I'll let you know." But what we're really thinking is: "I like the idea but I need time to sort out whether I can afford it." Or: "I wonder if the color is right for me?"

If these objections can be anticipated, or brought out into the open, they can be properly addressed and overcome. Most of us, human nature being what it is, keep a lot of our thoughts to ourselves because, whether we admit it openly or not, we have a natural instinct that tells us we shouldn't hurt anyone's feelings. And we often become embarrassed when we reject someone else.

The fact is everyone likes to be liked, so we protect ourselves by hiding our true thoughts. We don't come straight out and say, "Get off my back, I don't trust you." That's being offensive.

We don't like to admit that the price is too high. That indicates we have a lower "social standing" than we care to admit. Nor are we comfortable saying that we don't quite understand, in fear of appearing "dumb."

It's our own "fear of rejection" that's pulling the strings!

But what if you could somehow read and anticipate these fears and objections, many of which are unfounded? Think you'd sell a whole lot more of your goods and services than you do at the moment?

Sure would! Let me illustrate this with...

9.2. A Real Life Example

Not so many years ago, the sales tactics of a large auto sales company were "exposed" in the media. Used car salesmen? So what else is new?

This company had an extremely high sales conversion rate, one that was much higher than the industry norm. What was their strategy? They had a very potent salesperson working for them who had found a foolproof way of learning every customer objection!

Here's how...

Most of their customers were married couples or partners. After the salesperson had finished a highly professional presentation and demonstration of the product, he would go for the "close."

And if he was unsuccessful, he sat them in a comfortable private office, with a cup of hot coffee, and made an excuse to leave them alone for a few minutes. In the next office he listened to his prospects by way of a hidden microphone! (Which simply confirms your opinion about used car salesmen, right?)

Now the coffee was piping hot and it took a while to drink. Eventually, the couple openly discussed between themselves what they really thought of the deal, the company, and the salesman. Without fear of being overheard or pressured, they talked about their doubts, objections, financial circumstances, needs, and what they really wanted! They discussed it openly and honestly between themselves.

The salesperson had discovered the perfect way to read his prospects' mindset. So when he returned, he knew exactly what was on their minds and what they really wanted from him. He was able to present a sales pitch that overcame their objections, suited their needs, and gave them exactly what they wanted.

"It was almost as if he had read our minds" was a comment made by many of their customers when interviewed by the media. How right they were!

OK. This was a highly unprofessional and unethical way of doing business. It does, though, show the kind of results you could achieve if you knew how to "read" your prospective customers by getting inside their minds.

Now as far I know, the geeks haven't yet devised a way of reading your visitor's mind when she clicks on to your website or how to activate a hidden microphone in her computer. But since it's so important to get into their heads, you simply must learn how to...

9.3. Think Like Your "Ideal" Customer

Presumably, you're not a witch doctor. And as a mere mortal, you probably don't have the magic gift of telepathy in your sales copy toolbox.

Nor does your potential customer come face-to-face with you. She may be on the other side of the world, reading your "sales pitch" on her browser. So you can't invite objections from her because you won't be on the spot to answer and overcome them. And because you can't physically see her, there's no way you can watch her body language.

So you have to read her mindset, anticipate her most likely reactions to your sales pitch and overcome her objections before they arise. If you can learn to anticipate your reader's wants and real needs, you could provide those needs and wants in your sales copy.

And in the same way... if you could find a way to foresee her doubts and problems, you could solve them with carefully crafted words. Written in a way that convinced her that your product would provide the very answer she was looking for.

How can you achieve that?

- By knowing your "target" customer.
- By thinking like her.
- By acting like her.
- By learning her mindset.

You'll be employing a technique that only the very best copywriters and marketers use. This technique is so effective that, once you understand and begin to apply it, you'll see your online sales literally multiply before your eyes!

I promise you, this is not hype! It's an awesomely powerful technique that I call the...

9.4. Mindset-Reading Technique

Here's how it works. Let's say your product is a downloadable software package called "Miracle Traffic Software." It's designed to generate traffic automatically to the customer's website. (If you find one that works, let me know!) The product takes about 10 minutes to learn and is simple to use, just two clicks and it's on auto-pilot.

The cost is $200 and it comes with a 30-day free trial download and carries a 100% refund guarantee.

For this example, let's assume you already know and understand your "ideal" target customer. So all of your marketing, sales copy, website and advertising are specifically designed to attract his attention.

Now let's study your "ideal" customer even more carefully. Imagine him in your mind's eye and draw a detailed picture of him. He's...

- 30 - 40 years old, married with 2 children (5 and 7 years old).
- Middle manager with an income, $55,000 - $65,000 a year.
- Computer literate and technically minded, but not a geek.
- Runs part-time Internet business from home and spends 15-20 hours a week building his Internet business.
- Hardened to "hard sell" techniques and easily recognizes "hype."

He needs a second income of $100 a week in the immediate future, building to $50,000 a year. But what do you suppose he really wants? To give up his present job and work his Internet business full-time, and eventually earn $100,000 a year.

"So What?" you ask? Great question! Well, that self-employed $100,000 per year would result in...

- A bigger house and better car.
- Longer holidays and more time with his family.
- No boss, and the excitement and challenge of running his own business.
- Flexible working hours.
- The admiration of his friends and neighbors that success will bring him. (Never underestimate this. We all like to be admired and "respected.")

Beginning to get the idea? Are you starting to get a picture of him in your mind? Can you imagine him sitting in front of his computer reading your website? Can you see him at 7:00 p.m. in his spare room studying what you have to offer? Can you see what he's wearing? How he sits? How he talks?

Beginning to understand how to get inside his mind and "feel" like he feels? Do you have a reasonable idea of what he really wants from you? Are you beginning to see what his dreams, prejudices, problems and attitudes are?

In short, are you in a better position to read his mindset than you were a few moments ago?

Good, now let's see what makes him tick!

As a middle manager, how do you think he'll react if you "talk down" to him? If one of his staff explained a solution to him in "techie-speak" that he didn't understand, how do you think he would react? And since he deals with suppliers, contractors, and salespeople on a daily basis...

How many times do you think he has been let down, lied to or been given empty promises by these people?

How often has he experienced shoddy workmanship and poor after-sales service? Because he spends 15-20 hours a week on the Internet, how aware is he of the scams, over-hyped claims and the abundance of inferior goods and services being touted on the Web?

How much time, effort and money has he invested in researching the type of Internet tools he needs to build his business at his present Internet-savvy level?

How much do you think he knows about your competitors' products? OK. So now what do you know about him? One heck of a lot!

- His immediate need is a second income of $100 a week.
- He wants to become self-employed on $50,000 a year.
- Long term, he wants to double this income to $100,000 a year.
- He wants himself and his family to experience the "good things" in life.
- He needs help to build an Internet business to achieve these things.

You also determine that this customer...

- Is educated.
- Is confident in his own ability.
- Enjoys a challenge.
- Likes to take control.
- Seeks results, not the technicalities of how they're achieved.
- Delegates tasks and expects results.
- Won't tolerate being talked down to.
- Dislikes techie-talk.
- Is fairly Internet-savvy.
- Has looked at your competitors' product.
- Has researched his subject well.

- Doesn't accept promises at face value.
- Can easily spot unprofessional behavior.
- Needs facts and a refund guarantee before buying.
- Is able to make his own decisions but would probably discuss purchases over $100 with his wife.
- Has a reasonable disposable income.
- Spends almost up to what he earns.
- Budgets his money carefully.
- Has one or more credit cards.

Time to concentrate. At this point, you know what makes him tick and click. It's time to visualize his mindset. Picture him in your mind. He's sitting in front of his computer, clicking onto your website. Begin to think like he thinks.

He may think he needs traffic-building software, but what he really wants are the tools to build his Internet business and improve his lifestyle. He's been all around the Internet looking at several types of tools that can help him achieve that. And he's pretty sure that traffic-building software is his next step.

You know his likes and dislikes. He's a little frustrated with all the different offers, prices, promises and over-hyped claims. You have a good idea of what he'll be looking for when he reads your sales copy.

Then he comes across your site. So what's he thinking? What kind of mood is he in? What is he hoping to find on your website? What is he expecting to find on your home page? In short, what will he be looking for that will persuade him to buy Miracle Software?

Ken's Notes...

Good point buried in the sentence above. You don't actually sell. You persuade the customer to buy.

If this sounds so obvious that I should not have said it, think about it some more. So what will persuade him?

- A conservative, gizmo-free, professional-looking site using a persuasive rather than a hyped marketing message.
- A strong benefit-laden headline and jargon-free professionally written sales copy that talks to him, not down at him.
- A detailed explanation of how it will generate extra traffic for his site and how he and his business will benefit.

- Checkable testimonials to back up his claims, a no-quibble money-back guarantee, a free trial download to prove it for himself, and evidence of first-class customer service.
- Shows him that the one hour per day saved by using your software will free him up to build his business in other areas. And help him achieve his goal of gradually building a successful $100,000 a year Internet business, rather than instant riches.

Does that fit in with his mindset? Will sales copy of this nature match his personality type? Precisely!

Let's recap and see where you are now...

You know how to answer his objections before they arise.

You can eliminate his doubts about credibility and possible scams.

Finally, you're able to offer a solution to his problem, and take him a further step toward achieving his needs and satisfying his wants.

See the kind of persuasive power that you can build in to your sales message? If you can talk to your reader on a one-to-one basis, you have a massive advantage over your competitors. Understand and read the market, while your competitors are still fishing around.

You know the secret of mindset-reading. Now you know how to really start selling! Let's use it to transform your Internet sales and to burn off your competitors.

10. Let's Use Your New Skills!

"The important thing is to not stop questioning."

- Albert Einstein

OK, you know the theory. It's time to try it out! Ready?

You and I are about to embark on an interesting exercise together. We're going to write copy together. It's going to be successful, sales-pulling copy. By now, you know that successful copy depends entirely on how convincingly you present the benefits of buying your product.

How can you be sure that every benefit is presented? And how can you be sure you've uncovered the best and biggest benefits?

"I know that answer now," you say. "Just enter your customer's mindset, examine the product, list every feature, and turn each feature into a benefit for the customer."

You're learning fast, grasshopper. But that's only part of the answer. Let's look at it another way. How can you develop a comprehensive set of benefits, prioritize them, develop the correct USP, and then write a full page or two of copy that sells?

We need a system that works for A-N-Y-O-N-E.

"SWAT?" is the answer, as in "So What?"

The SWAT? technique forces you to uncover the maximum possible number of features and benefits of your product.

It's a variation of a technique used by only a few top pros (that I know of, in any event!). Ken told me to pour everything into the book, so here are the details of my most powerful copywriting weapon, revealed for the first time.

SWAT is so powerful, so simple, and so magical, it will create more benefits than you ever thought possible! No hype! That's not my style. When you use this technique, your sales message and every piece of your marketing materials will write themselves.

There's no better way to explain SWAT? than by using an example. So...

10.1. Hey, You and I Have a Client!

For the next few chapters, you and I will write the copy for the promotion of a hypothetical product, The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business (MDD). Step by step, we'll do the website copy, order page, follow-up sales letters, and newsletter ads.

MDD is a complete home business package that enables anyone to design, produce, and sell any garment, from the traditional to the very latest in high fashion.

What's that? Your particular product or service bears no resemblance to MDD?

It doesn't matter. The techniques for selling any product are the same. Actually, when you and I work through this "case study" for a product and market that you don't know and understand, your real copywriting challenge will be far easier.

Soon you'll be learning the precise methods you should use to produce exciting, persuasive and successful copy, written specifically for your customers and your product.

Let's introduce you to our new product...

10.1.1. Our New Product

Here's the "in a nutshell" description of the "Miracle Dress Designer" Home Business...

"Miracle Dress Designer" software reduces the time-consuming "mundane" aspects of designing dresses by automatically generating dress patterns to your individual design.

- Software recognized as being the easiest-to-use software of its type on the market.
- A comprehensive and interactive video tutorial.
- E-book showing how to start up and run a home-based dressmaking business.
- Free membership to the monthly "Miracle Dress Designer Club" newsletter.

And there's more to MDD...

- Price is $197.
- Download plus optional discs by "snail mail."
- 30-day free trial.
- No computer or sewing machine experience needed.

Phew! That's our product. Now let's introduce...

10.1.2. Our “Ideal” Customer

We must write and aim every single piece of our advertising and sales copy for one individual person. Our “ideal” customer thumbnail sketch...

- Home-based woman.
- No or basic sewing machine skills.
- Looking for a start-up business to operate from home.
- Mostly with a family.
- Age group 25 plus.

And to round out the main details of our picture...

- Limited start-up capital.
- Little or no business experience.
- Wanting to earn extra $100+ per week.
- 10 to 25 spare hours per week.
- Limited computer skills.

Now that we know our product and our customer, let’s decide upon...

10.1.3. Our Most Wanted Response (MWR)

We just described our product and identified our “ideal” customer. Now what?

Well, I don’t know about you, but I can’t write anything until I know the purpose of the sales message. Every word, sentence, and paragraph has to focus on achieving the action that we want our customer to take.

Knowing our visitor’s mindset, it’s hardly practical to expect her to spend $197 without convincing proof that that MDD will give her everything she wants.

What’s the best way to convince her? Let her try it herself for free. So our MWR (Most Wanted Response) is to persuade her to download our 30-day free trial.

OK, now that we have the fundamental ingredients of our sales message, we can...

10.2. Pick the Easy, Low-Hanging Fruit

Based on what we know about the product and our target customer, it’s easy to use the mindset and features-to-benefits techniques to develop the obvious stuff...

1) Feature: Detailed and easy to understand “how-to” e-book on setting up and running a home-based dressmaking business.

Benefit: I will learn how to make extra money working from home, and still spend the time I need with my family.

2) Feature: Software that’s simple to install and easy to learn.

Benefit: I need no knowledge of computers. Just point and click.

3) Feature: No previous experience designing dresses or sewing required.

Benefit: I don’t have to learn a new profession. I can have my business up and running almost immediately.

4) Feature: Just point and click to custom-design 250 styles of ladies’ and children’s fashions, in any size.

Benefit: I can design any style of garment from traditional styles to the latest high fashion, for myself, my friends, my children, and for resale.

5) Feature: Advises which type of material is suitable for any particular style or design you’ve generated.

Benefit: Ensures my finished garment is totally professional. I won’t make any expensive mistakes.

6) Feature: Software automatically generates templates, calculates hem widths and type of stitch.

Benefit: Even a no-brainer can do it. Once I choose the design I want, everything else is done for me.

7) Feature: Easier to use than any other dress design software.

Benefit: I can produce a garment quicker than with other software.

8) Feature: Costs only $197.

Benefit: That’s a reasonably affordable price to start my own home business. I can recoup that with my first 3 orders.

9) Feature: Takes just 30 minutes to install and learn.

Benefit: Must be really simple to use, with a fast learning curve.

10) Feature: Built-in comprehensive video tutorial.

Benefit: I can learn fast and easy from step-by-step examples.

11) Feature: Available for Mac or Windows.

Benefit: I can use it on my brand new Mac. Many business opportunities only cater for PCs.

12) Feature: 12-month money-back guarantee.

Benefit: They must be confident I'll be satisfied. I can use it for a whole year and if I find it's not for me, I can get my money back. Only an honest and established company would give a guarantee that long.

13) Feature: 30-day free trial download.

Benefit: I can download it free. If it's not as good as they say it is, I've lost nothing. They must be confident that I'll like it.

14) Feature: Download and optional discs.

Benefit: I can have it instantly. And if I get the discs, I can reload it if something goes wrong.

15) Feature: Free help by email.

Benefit: If I get stuck I can get help and advice. I'll never be left on my own. Seems like a well-established company.

16) Feature: Free membership to the Miracle Dress Maker Club newsletter with tips and tricks on all aspects of running a home dressmaking business.

Benefit: I can keep up-to-date with all the latest information. The newsletter will help me learn faster and help me grow my business quicker.

Now what?

We've created a good list, but it's just the starting point. Could we write some acceptable copy based on this? Sure, but we want to go way past "acceptable."

Let's start by choosing the biggest benefit. And to do that, we must get into her mindset.

Once again, imagine her in your mind's eye. She's at home, wondering how to resolve her problem. Think like her! Write down her thoughts...

"I'm a homemaker with a family."

"I enjoy being a homemaker and looking after my children."

"I have a little time on my hands and could do with some extra money for those little extras for myself and my children. An extra $100 to $200 would be ideal."

"I can't take a part-time job because I need to be at home most of the time. So my only option is to start a little business from home. But which business?"

"It has to be something I will enjoy."

OK, now get another sheet of paper. She's been thinking about this for a long time...

"It has to be flexible enough to work around my family because I need to be there whenever they need me."

"I don't want to spend too much time and energy learning a whole new skill, and I don't have a great deal of money to spend on setting it up."

"I haven't worked for myself before so I'm a little nervous."

"I can't afford to make the wrong choice so taking a risk is not an option."

"I've looked at several business opportunities and I'm confused about which choice to make."

"In an ideal world I would like to find a trustworthy company that offers a business opportunity that is... Easy to set up, let's me work when I want, inexpensive to start, enjoyable, and offers plenty of support and help if I encounter any problems."

"To be honest, I need the courage and reassurance to make the big step into the unknown."

Well, now we know what she needs. But what does she really want? She almost answered it herself...

"A risk-free home business that's simple to set up and operate and doesn't interfere with my family life. An enjoyable business that earns at least $100 a week to treat my family and me. This will give me a tremendous sense of achievement and a deep sense of satisfaction knowing that I'm giving my family the extra luxuries they deserve."

Now we're getting somewhere. We know our "ideal" customer and exactly what she wants. It's time to "sit down" with her, and show her precisely how the MDD package will solve her problem and give her exactly what she wants.

We don't have to tell half-truths or invent benefits that don't exist because we know that MDD will help her achieve what she wants. What we have to do is present MDD in the best possible light so she can see immediately that it will solve her problem.

For instance, if we were to tell her that...

Miracle Dress Designer is an advanced software package that automates most of the difficult and mundane areas of designing dresses...

How do think she'd react? Oh geez, there's that mouse click again!

But now that we know what she wants, we can write our headline and sales message to precisely match her needs and her exact wants! And the tastiest ingredient in our headline is our USP.

Remember how to uncover it? Correct! Expand on our list of MDD's benefits. Let's crank up the good old...

10.3. SWAT? Benefit Generator

What's that? You've never used this type of machine before? You're in for a treat! It will open the lid of your treasure chest of persuasive and profitable sales copy.

Use it properly, without attempting any shortcuts. You'll find it "forces" you to uncover every single benefit your customer seeks.

The combined mindset and features-to-benefits technique allowed us to create 16 benefits (above). It alone is an excellent technique that most people never learn to use effectively. So we already hold a huge advantage over them.

But when you use the SWAT? Benefit Generator, you'll see those 16 benefits explode into a massive list of over 100 features and benefits. Our competitors will be left far behind, literally scrambling to catch up.

The technique uses such a staggeringly simple concept that at first you won't realize how well it's working. But you'll have to concentrate and work at it! If you do, your copy will almost write itself. And the results will literally transform every aspect of your business.

So let's see the SWAT? Benefit Generator in action, producing an incredible set of benefits and an unbeatable USP.

Remember the process? You're sitting down with her and telling her how much MDD will improve her and her family's lifestyle.

You're still in her mindset. For every feature you offer her, she'll ask you "So What?" and then you'll reply with a benefit!

Yes, I know. You already did that once. But here's the key to the success of this amazing technique. You have to keep answering the "So What?" question until it's impossible for her to ask that annoying question any more.

Take a minute to let that sink in. Such a simple idea is ever so easy to skip over. I make no apologies for repeating it.

You have to keep answering the "So What?" question until it's impossible for her to ask that annoying question any more.

Let's see what happens when we apply it to "The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business."

10.4. Let's SWAT? a Huge Benefit List

Let's do it, feature by feature by feature...

Feature: Detailed and easy to understand "how-to" e-book on setting up and running a part-time dressmaking business.

SWAT? You'll learn how to make extra money working from home, and still have the time you need with your family.

SWAT? You'll be able to afford to give your family a higher standard of living.

SWAT? They'll appreciate you more...

Feature: Software that's simple to install and easy to learn.

SWAT? You need no knowledge of computers. Just point and click.

SWAT? You don't have to learn a new skill.

SWAT? You'll save days or even weeks of hard work just to get started.

SWAT? You won't be distracted from your family life.

SWAT? You can start your own business immediately.

SWAT? Your family will begin to enjoy those extras within days.

SWAT? You'll have achieved exactly what you want...

Feature: No previous experience designing dresses or sewing required.

SWAT? You don't have to learn a new profession.

SWAT? You'll have your business up and running almost immediately.

SWAT? Your family will begin to enjoy those extras within days.

SWAT? You'll have achieved exactly what you want...

Feature: Just point and click to design 250 custom styles of ladies' and children's fashions, in any size.

SWAT? You can design any style of garment from traditional to the latest high fashions — for yourself, your friends, your children, and resale.

SWAT? You'll confidently take orders for any size and style of garment.

SWAT? You won't have to turn away orders.

SWAT? You'll achieve high credibility with your customers.

SWAT? You'll win the respect of your customers as a professional.

SWAT? You can start taking orders immediately and from anyone.

SWAT? You'll start earning money immediately.

SWAT? You can begin treating your family within days.

SWAT? You'll achieve everything you want...

Feature: Advises which type of material is suitable for any particular style or design you have generated.

SWAT? Ensures your finished garment is totally professional.

SWAT? You won't make any expensive mistakes.

SWAT? You'll heighten your reputation.

SWAT? You'll generate more orders and word of mouth referrals.

SWAT? You'll expand your business quickly.

SWAT? You'll earn extra money.

SWAT? You can afford the luxuries you want for your family.

SWAT? You'll have achieved everything you wanted...

Feature: Software automatically generates templates and calculates hem widths and type of stitch.

SWAT? Just choose the design you want. Everything else is done for you.

SWAT? Everything will be designed perfectly every time.

SWAT? You won't make expensive mistakes.

SWAT? You'll enjoy your work more.

SWAT? Earning extra money will be fun....

Feature: Easier to use than any other dress design software.

SWAT? You'll know it's the best and quickest software on the market.

SWAT? You'll produce a garment quicker than with other software.

SWAT? You won't worry about having to spend more money on another brand of software.

SWAT? You won't be risking money on the brand of software to buy...

Feature: Costs only $197.

SWAT? That's a reasonably affordable price to start your own home business.

SWAT? You can recoup that with your first five orders.

SWAT? You won't have to make financial sacrifices to set up your business.

SWAT? Your family won't suffer while you're getting started.

SWAT? You won't have worries to distract you from your business...

Feature: Takes just 30 minutes to install and learn.

SWAT? It's really simple to use.

SWAT? You won't have to suffer the time and frustration of learning new skills.

SWAT? You can be confident you'll be able to start without any problems.

SWAT? You won't make expensive mistakes.

SWAT? You'll be making money, not spending it.

SWAT? Your family will start enjoying the extra money straight away...

Feature: Online interactive video tutorial.

SWAT? It's the easiest and quickest way to learn.

SWAT? You'll learn fast and easily from actual step-by-step examples.

SWAT? You'll produce your first completed garment within hours of starting your business.

SWAT? You'll feel a terrific sense of achievement.

SWAT? Your apprehension about starting a business will quickly disappear...

Feature: Available for Mac or Windows.

SWAT? Most business opportunities only cater to PCs.

SWAT? You can use it on a Mac.

Feature: 12 month money back guarantee.

SWAT? You can use it for a whole year and if it's not for you, then you get your money back.

SWAT? Only a really honest and established company would give a guarantee that long. Most only give 30 days.

SWAT? It must be everything we say it is.

SWAT? If it wasn't, we would be foolish to offer such a long guarantee.

SWAT? Your decision to buy from us is totally risk-free.

SWAT? You won't be any worse off if you tried it then asked for a refund.

SWAT? Your startup capital is totally protected.

SWAT? Your family, and your confidence, won't suffer...

Feature: 30-day free trial download.

SWAT? We're absolutely confident you'll like it.

SWAT? You have the chance to try it out without risking a dime.

SWAT? You'll know for certain whether it's everything you want for your ideal home business.

SWAT? If it's not what you want, you've risked nothing...

Feature: Download plus optional discs.

SWAT? You can run from the discs if you haven't much space on your hard drive.

And if you load it into your computer, you won't lose your data if your PC crashes.

SWAT? Your business is totally protected.

SWAT? Your income won't suffer.

SWAT? Your family won't be affected....

Feature: Free help by email.

SWAT? If you get stuck you can get help and advice.

SWAT? You'll never be left on your own.

SWAT? You won't have to struggle to learn your business.

SWAT? You'll establish your business faster.

SWAT? You'll start earning faster.

SWAT? Your family will benefit quicker...

Feature: Free membership to the "Miracle Dress Maker Club" newsletter with tips and tricks on all aspects of running a home dressmaking business.

SWAT? You'll keep up-to-date with all the latest information.

SWAT? You'll keep up-to-date on everything in your industry.

SWAT? You'll design the most up-to-date garments for your customers.

SWAT? They'll return to you for the latest fashions.

SWAT? You'll build a larger base of loyal customers.

SWAT? You'll get more repeat orders and referrals.

SWAT? You'll make more money.

SWAT? You'll provide even more luxuries for your family.

SWAT? Your family will appreciate you more.

SWAT? The family bond will grow stronger...

See what's just happened? We started off with 16 features. From those 16 features, we originally generated 16 benefits. By using the SWAT? Benefit Generator we have multiplied 16 benefits into 90, giving you a staggering total of 106 features and benefits!

Imagine how persuasive and exciting your copy will be when it's loaded with 106 features and benefits. Every one of them is specifically identified to satisfy your reader's needs.

And each one provides exactly what she really wants.

Ken's Notes...

One of the hardest things about good copywriting is generating benefits rather than getting stuck on features. The SWAT? technique is sheer genius.

SWAT? is something you must do, along with the three key steps to great headlines outlined earlier. (Quick review of the steps: do headlines first, make them tell a story, and follow the seven "pro" techniques.)

Use SWAT? on every one of your benefits until you just can't SWAT? any more benefits. It will make your copy far stronger.

Think about how she now feels, having just seen our competitors' copy, which contains a mere fraction of the benefits that we're offering. Interested? Very interested? Reassured? Excited?

Our customer is feeling more than excited. She's ready to buy!

OK, in a few cases, the same benefit was generated from several different features. But doesn't that tell you something? Doesn't it tell you that perhaps this may be one of the strongest benefits of MDD?

Now let's stay in her mindset and go through our final list, looking at it from her point of view. Keep what she needs constantly in the forefront of your mind, partner. And most importantly, what she really wants. Which is...

"A risk-free home business that's simple to set up and operate and doesn't interfere with my family life. I can build an enjoyable business that earns at least $100 a week to treat my family and myself. This will give me a tremendous sense of achievement and a deep sense of satisfaction knowing I'm giving my family the extra luxuries they deserve."

Which of our benefits will give her what she specifically wants? How about the following?

- You'll learn how to make extra money working from home, and still spend the time you need with your family.
- You can start your own business immediately.
- Earning extra money will be fun.
- You won't have to suffer the time and frustration of learning new skills.
- You'll feel a terrific sense of achievement.
- Your family will quickly begin enjoying the extra income.
- You have a risk-free chance to try it out, without spending a dime.

Now, from her point of view, combine these benefits into a summary that promises her exactly what she wants, which is...

- Feel a terrific sense of achievement.
- Start your own fun business immediately.
- Without risking a dime.
- And still spend the time you need with your family.

Let's write...

With Miracle Dress Designer you quickly begin enjoying the fun and totally risk-free satisfaction of making an extra $100-$200 weekly for your family, without affecting your family life in any way.

Now we can ask final questions...

Does that sum up everything she wants? Do you think our competitors will be offering her so much? Or will they be stating the same bland, "me-centered" list of features as everyone else, and desperately dangle them as bait in the big pond?

And which site will appeal the most to our readers? Ours? Congratulations. I'll pat your back and you pat mine. We just uncovered our USP!

But we've achieved more than that. We've also uncovered 106 features and benefits that will make our headlines and sales copy the most persuasive message our reader will ever come across.

Why? Because our USP and every single benefit are exactly what she's looking for! Our carefully created sales message written specifically for her will solve her problem and give her the reassurance and courage she needs to buy from us.

Competition? What competition?

Brace yourself. It gets even better. Believe it or not, you ain't seen nuthin' yet. Now for some magic...

10.5. Presto! The Copy Writes Itself!

So far, we have a way to create something that most people find too difficult to even attempt — the correct USP! This is a powerful advantage. We also have an efficient and effective way to uncover the maximum number of benefits, especially created for our specific customer.

And we have much more...

We also have the secret to writing the most irresistible and persuasive sales message you could ever imagine! Our competitors' sales copy will appear lifeless by comparison!

Here's the proof. Look again at our list of 90 benefits and 16 features.

Remove the SWAT's and link each feature and benefit with a "So," "but," "also," "and," "when," etc., and then read through our list as if it were a complete message.

Notice anything? Isn't it amazing? Almost unbelievable, wouldn't you agree? We have already written 90% of our sales copy! And it's sales copy that's absolutely saturated with every single benefit that our customer could ever wish for!

Awesome. That's the only word for it. Because with careful editing, the addition of some strategically positioned power words, and a couple more professional techniques (to be covered shortly), our list will quickly transform into the most effective sales message possible.

And it will be written specifically for our "ideal" customer. We will be speaking directly to her and saying... "I know exactly what you want. So here it is on a plate." And she'll buy!

So let's put our first draft together. Don't worry about the grammar or the layout. This is merely a linked list of our features and benefits...

The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Package contains everything you'll ever need to start and run your very own home business.

(This unique and easy to set up package contains...)

A detailed and easy to understand how-to e-book on setting up and running a part-time home-based dressmaking business.

So you'll learn how to make extra money working from home, and still spend the time you need with your family.

Owning your own dress design business means you'll be able to afford to give your family the higher standard of living you know they deserve.

The software is simple to install and very easy to learn. So... You don't need any knowledge of computers.

Just point and click. So you don't have to learn a new skill. And you'll save days or even weeks of hard work usually needed just to get started. So you won't be distracted from your family life.

It means you can start your own business immediately, and your family will begin to enjoy those extras within days.

The Miracle Dress Designer is so unique that you need no previous experience designing dresses or sewing. So you don't have to learn a new profession. Just point and click to design 250 custom styles of ladies' fashions and children's fashions in any size.

This enables you to design any style of garment from traditional styles to the latest high fashion for yourself, your friends and your children, and for resale.

You'll confidently take orders for any size and style of garment, and you won't have to turn orders away. You'll achieve high credibility with your customers and win the respect of your customers as a professional. You can start taking orders immediately and from anyone.

So you can start earning extra money immediately.

This incredibly advanced software even advises which type of material is suitable for any particular style or design you've generated, ensuring that your finished garment is totally professional in every respect. So you won't make any expensive mistakes.

This will help heighten your reputation with your customers, and will generate more orders and word of mouth referrals, which will expand your business quickly and effortlessly.

And, of course, earn extra money faster for you and your family.

It automatically generates templates and calculates hem widths and type of stitch. You just choose the design you want and everything else is done for you.

So everything will be designed perfectly every time, eliminating costly mistakes.

You'll enjoy your work more.

In fact you'll soon realize that earning extra money will be fun.

Miracle Dress Designer is easier to use than any other dress design software. So you'll know it's the best and quickest software on the market.

You'll produce garments quicker than with other software without the nagging worry about having to spend more money on another brand of software in the future.

The very affordable price means that you can recoup your investment with your first five orders. So you won't have to make financial sacrifices to set up your business. And your family won't suffer while you're getting started.

It takes just 30 minutes to install and learn.

It's really simple to use. And because you won't have to suffer the time and frustration of learning new skills, you can be confident you'll be able to get started without any problems.

And because you won't make expensive mistakes, you'll be making money, not spending it.

Online interactive video tutorial

Miracle Dress Designer's video tutorial makes it the easiest and quickest way to learn.

You'll learn fast and easily from step-by-step examples. You'll be producing your first completed garment within hours of starting your business.

You'll feel a terrific sense of achievement, and your apprehension about starting a business will quickly disappear.

Available for Mac or Windows

Most business opportunities only cater for PCs. But you can use Miracle Dress Designer on a Mac.

12-Month Money-Back Guarantee

You can own Miracle Dress Designer for a whole year, and if you find it's not for you, then you get your money back.

So you can see we must be confident you'll be satisfied. Only a really honest and established company would give a guarantee that long. Most companies only give 30 days.

And it must be everything we say it is. If it wasn't, we would be foolish to offer such a long guarantee.

Because your decision to buy from us is totally risk-free, you won't be any worse off if you tried it then asked for a refund. And your start-up capital is totally protected.

30-Day Free Trial Download

We're so confident you'll like it, you have the chance to try it out without risking a dime. After 30 days you'll know for certain whether it's everything you want for your ideal home business.

And if it's not what you want, you've risked nothing..

Download and Disc Options

You can run Miracle Dress Designer from the disc if you haven't much space on your hard drive. And if you run it from your disc, you won't lose your program if your computer crashes.

So your business is totally protected. Neither your income nor your family will suffer.

Free Help by Email

If you get stuck, you can get help and advice so you'll never be left on your own. We make sure you won't have to struggle to learn your business.

This will establish your business faster, and you'll start earning faster.

Free Membership

You will automatically become a member of the Miracle Dress Maker Club newsletter. With tips and tricks on all aspects of running a home dressmaking business, you'll keep up-to-date on everything in the dressmaking and fashion industry.

So you'll design the most up-to-date garments for your customers, and they'll return to you for the latest fashions.

You'll build a larger base of loyal customers and get more repeat orders and referrals. So you'll make more money to provide even more luxuries for your family.

Real magic! Remember, this is not our final sales message!

Word for word, this is our original list of 106 benefits and features simplistically linked together with a few joining words.

But what a first draft!

Later, we'll learn how to edit and restructure this draft copy into a finely tuned and professionally crafted benefit-saturated, order-generating sales message.

Let's recap what we've achieved so far...

- Focused our MWR (Most Wanted Response).
- Established the mindset of our "ideal" customer and discovered her needs. But more importantly, we found out what she really wants.
- SWAT?-ed 106 powerful features and benefits that are relevant to her.
- Discovered our USP.
- Written the first draft of our sales message.

And, to top it all off, you and I now have everything we need to create the most important item in our sales message, which will either make or break our whole marketing effort... our opening headline!

So why don't we do that right now?

10.6. Let's Create Our Headline

Here we go again. Somehow, you and I always seem to end up at the same place inside our "ideal" customer's mindset. It's just you, me and her. Nobody else matters. Bear in your mind that we can't sell to all potential buyers. So perfect the method of selling to an ideal individual. From here on in we must focus on her thoughts...

She's just clicked through to our website. What's going through her mind? Imagine her searching yet again, looking for the answer to her problem.

How is she feeling? What's her attitude like? She's looked at so many "opportunities" and is beginning to become a little cynical, confused, frustrated, or even despondent!

She probably isn't quite sure what kind of business she's looking for. But we have a terrific advantage over our competitors. We know exactly what she wants!

"A risk-free home business that's simple to set up and operate and doesn't interfere with my family life. I can build an enjoyable business that earns at least $100 a week to treat my family and myself. This will give me a tremendous sense of achievement and a deep sense of satisfaction knowing I'm giving my family the extra luxuries they deserve."

Perhaps she visited a few other sites just before she found ours. So her visit may even be a little half-hearted. She certainly isn't convinced our site is going to offer the answer. OK, let's be frank. She's downright skeptical.

So we know that in order to grab her attention, we must immediately show her that we can solve her problem and give her exactly what she wants. And we have three seconds to do it!

The only way to achieve this is with our headline. But not just any ordinary headline. Our headline must boast our USP — it must promise her that we have the ideal solution to her problem. It has to say... "Look no further. Here's the solution to everything you want."

And it has to be front and center on the web page. So do you think she'll be filled with enthusiasm and excitement if she reads this headline?

The Miracle Dress Designer Generates
Templates Faster Than Any Other Software

Ugh! A "feature" headline won't do it for her. She's not thinking, "Geez, I want speed."

Does this headline seem familiar to you? Not the "Miracle Dress Designer" part, but the "type" of headline. Look at the message. Ring any bells?

It's the kind of bland, uninteresting and ineffective headline we see on so many websites, including those of our competitors. It's the kind of headline they're using as "bait" to fish in the big pond. Now we see why they get so few bites.

It's a "me" message. It advertises a feature. It appeals to a tiny percentage of potential customers — existing dress designers specifically looking for a quicker software package.

It doesn't answer our "ideal" customer's overriding question... "What's in it for me?" So it's a failure!

What, then, do we write? Here's where our hard work starts paying off. Let's look again at our USP.

With Miracle Dress Designer, you'll quickly begin enjoying the fun and totally risk-free satisfaction of making an extra $100 - $200 weekly for your family, without affecting your family life in any way.

This one phrase offers our reader everything she wants. So why don't we use this as our headline?

We also know her attitude. She's in a hurry and so she does what most of us do — she scans! Her eyes quickly dart over our text, searching for something to grab her attention. She's looking for a word or short sentence that will ring a bell in her mind.

We must stop her scanning immediately, or she'll be gone. Keep her attention. Persuade her to begin reading at the top of our sales message, or we'll miss the opportunity to draw her into the body of it.

So let's condense or rewrite our USP into a short punchy headline, one that will grab her attention immediately.

Time to look closely at our USP again...

With Miracle Dress Designer, you'll quickly begin enjoying the fun and totally risk-free satisfaction of making an extra $100 - $200 weekly for your family, without affecting your family life in any way.

Which words do you feel would give her that? "Miracle Dress Designer?" Hardly. At the moment, she doesn't even know what it is.

Let's try... "Fun," "Risk-Free," "Quickly," "Extra $100 - $200 weekly," and "Family." These words should trigger a reaction. After all, each one describes at least part of something she wants.

Be careful. This is where so many people make a huge mistake. They try too hard to come up with power words. They see these words used all over the Internet, in newsletter ads and on websites. Hey, so many marketers are using them! They must work, right? So they unwittingly do the same.

That type of marketer comes up with a headline like...

*How to Make $100,000 a Year Part-time
With Amazing Home Business Opportunity*

Or...

*End Your Money Worries Forever
Working Just 10 Hours a Week*

OK, OK. I can almost hear you saying, "But what's wrong with headlines like these?" After all, they tell the reader she can make extra money, don't they? They tell her she can do it from home, don't they? And those are her needs, aren't they?

Yes on all counts. But where is what she “wants”? And most importantly, she’ll have to read well into the sales copy to find out if our business opportunity will deliver the exact solution to her problem.

Keep in mind that she’s visited lots of sites and scanned pages and pages of copy, only to discover that the business didn’t suit her. She’s seen so many “get-rich quick” schemes, complicated business plans, and far-fetched claims by so-called successful “Netpreneurs” that her eyes are glazing over.

But we’re in her mindset. We know better than anyone that she just isn’t interested in a headline that she’s seen a hundred times or more.

What about using the hyped-up “hard sell” type of headlines, which constantly thrust themselves at her? How about something like...

$

Discover the Secrets to Making
Thousands in Your Spare Time

$

Will that impress her? Oh yeah.

How about...

How to Make $100,000 or More a Year Working
From Your Kitchen Table in Your Pajamas

Not another pajama line!!!

Will those headlines grab her? Never in a million years. And we both know why. Is it because she doesn’t wear pajamas?

No, it’s because she’s seen it all before! She’s immune to it. They don’t offer her what she really wants. In fact, headlines like these are almost invisible to her!

How do we get her attention and start the selling process? The simple answer is...

10.6.1. No Need for Hype, No Need to Be Clever

In fact, it’s so simple that it’s difficult to understand why everyone doesn’t do it.

Just promise to give her exactly what she wants! Our competitors can’t because they don’t know that. Our visitor wants to earn an extra $100 - $200 a week. So why beef it up to $100,000 a year?

Yes, I know that $100,000 a year is a heck of a lot more than $200 a week. But don't you think $100,000 may look unbelievable, even unattainable, to her? After all, her B.S. detector is already working overtime.

She wants and can already imagine herself earning $200 a week. So promise her what she wants! And let's substantiate our promise in our sub-heading, our opening paragraph and our sales copy, like this...

The Ideal Risk-Free Way for Homemakers
Like You to Earn Extra Money

But this only delivers part of our promise. It's enough to grab her attention. We must follow it immediately with a sub-heading that offers her exactly what she wants.

Here goes...

The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business is the fun way to enjoy the totally risk-free satisfaction of making an extra $100-$200 a week for those little extras, without affecting your family life.

Now let's tighten it up and add some "punch" to our promise. Using some of the tips we learned earlier, we can make our headline as powerful, as persuasive, and as intriguing as possible to give it maximum impact.

- Add a "reasonable and relevant" power word. She's been looking around for a long time so how about... "At last" or "Discover" or "How to."
- To give it more of a me-to-you feel, let's contain it between quotation marks.
- Delete every word that doesn't add to the impact of the message.
- Next, start each main word in the main headline with a Capital Letter and increase the font size to give it more impact.
- Almost done. Remove the period at the end of the sentence to ease the flow from one sentence to another.

Now let's see what we have to offer...

"At Last, the Totally Risk-Free Way for Busy Homemakers Like You to Earn Extra Money"

"The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business
Is the Fun Way to Enjoy the Totally Risk-Free
Satisfaction of Making $100 - $200 a Week for Those Little Extras Without Affecting Your Family Life"

Look at it critically, still in her mindset...

Do these two promises offer her everything she wants? Are they good enough to persuade her to stop scanning? Do you think she'll be interested or even excited enough to read our main sales message?

Will this be a much stronger and more persuasive headline than our competitor's? Yes? Congratulations! Our website has just captured our "ideal" customer! She'll read the rest of our copy, as long as it continues to deliver what she wants.

Note: As I said earlier, I write the headline first while I'm fully primed, and before I get into the longer job of writing the full body copy. The linked list of features and benefits above is just a "pre-first draft" of the body copy. We'll use it to write the body copy together in the next section.

Let's review what you and I have achieved so far...

- Identified our target market.
- Described our "ideal" customer.
- Established her mindset.
- Discovered her needs.
- Discovered what she really wants.
- Discovered the awesome power of the SWAT? Benefit Generator and uncovered 106 features and benefits.
- Created our USP.
- Written our opening headline.
- Written our first sub-heading.
- Written our draft sales message.

Think we're getting somewhere? I'll say we are. Even at this stage, we're way ahead of the competition! Wait until you see what's ahead...

10.7. Starting the Sales Message

This is the moment when so many copywriters begin to feel overwhelmed. In fact, they can feel downright intimidated. So much to say and so little space to say it in.

Know the feeling? Apprehension grips the stomach and freezes the thinking process. Gray matter turns to solid stone. They stare at that intimidating blank screen or an unforgiving sheet of paper and say out loud, "Oh no. Where on earth do I start? I know what I want to say, but I feel like a dunce. How do I say it? All those copywriting articles I've read. All that advice, for what?"

After several false starts, desperation creeps in and they think to themselves, “Good writers are so much smarter than me. It’s easy for them. They must have a natural talent. Who am I to think I can write as well as them?”

But now you know better, don’t you? You know that you can write as good as anyone... er, as well as anyone. So if this ever happens to you, just calm down and don’t panic!

You already have the proof that great persuasive copy isn’t produced with smoke and mirrors. It takes neither a “good” education nor a special gift. It’s a case of having the self-discipline to follow the correct guidelines, and to tackle one thing at a time.

After all, just look at how much we’ve already achieved with the simple use of SWAT?. We’ve written a terrific headline, and our computer wrote a first draft of our sales message all by itself!

Let’s review our list of benefits, linked into first drafts of blocks of sales copy...

1. The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Package contains everything you will ever need to start and run your very own home business.
2. It contains a detailed and easy-to-understand “how-to” e-book on setting up and running a part-time home-based dressmaking business.
3. So you’ll learn how to make extra money working from home, and still spend the time you need with your family.
4. Owning your own dress design business means you’ll be able to afford to give your family the higher standard of living you know they deserve.
5. We’re so confident you’ll like it you have the chance to try it out without risking a dime. After 30 days you’ll know for certain whether it’s everything you want for your ideal home business.
6. And if it’s not what you want, you’ve risked nothing.
7. The software is simple to install and easy to learn. So...
8. You don’t need any knowledge of computers. Just point and click. So you don’t have to learn a new skill. And you’ll save days or even weeks of hard work usually needed just to get started. So you won’t be distracted from your family life.
9. It means you can start your own business immediately and your family will begin to enjoy those extras within days.
10. The Miracle Dress Designer is so unique that you don’t need experience designing dresses or sewing. So you don’t have to learn a new profession. Just point and click to design 250 custom styles of ladies’ and children’s fashions, in any size.
11. This enables you to design any style of garment from traditional styles to the latest high fashion, for yourself, your friends and your children, and for resale.

12. You'll confidently take orders for any size and style of garment and you won't have to turn orders away. You'll achieve high credibility with your customers
13. You'll win the respect of your customers as a professional. So you can start taking orders immediately and from anyone.
14. And start earning extra money immediately.
15. This incredibly advanced software even advises which type of material is suitable for any particular style or design you have generated. This ensures that your finished garment is totally professional in every respect. So you won't make any expensive mistakes.
16. This will help heighten your reputation with your customers, who will generate more orders and word of mouth referrals, expanding your business quickly and effortlessly.
17. And of course earning extra money for yourself and your family.
18. It automatically generates templates, and calculates hem widths and type of stitch. You just choose the design you want and everything else is done for you.
19. So everything will be designed perfectly every time, eliminating costly and expensive mistakes.
20. So you'll enjoy your work more. In fact, you'll soon realize that earning extra money will be fun.
21. Miracle Dress Designer is easier to use than any other dress design software. So you'll know it's the best and quickest software on the market.
22. You'll produce garments quicker than with other software, without the nagging worry about having to spend more money on another brand of software in the future.
23. The reasonably affordable price means that you can recoup your investment with your first five orders. So you won't have to make financial sacrifices to set up your business. And your family won't suffer while you're getting started.
24. It takes just 30 minutes to install and learn.
25. It's really simple to use. And because you won't have to suffer the time and frustration of learning new skills, you can be confident you'll be able to start without any problems.
26. And because you won't make expensive mistakes, you'll be making money, not spending it.
27. The Miracle Dress Designer video tutorial is the easiest and quickest way to learn.
28. You'll learn fast and easily from step-by-step examples. You'll be producing your first completed garment within hours of starting your business.
29. You'll feel a terrific sense of achievement, and your apprehension about starting a business will quickly disappear.

30. Available for Mac or Windows.
31. Most business opportunities only cater to PCs. But you can use Miracle Dress Designer on a Mac.
32. 12-month money-back guarantee.
33. You can own Miracle Dress Designer for a whole year. If you find it's not for you then you get your money back.
34. So you can see we must be confident you'll be satisfied. Only a really honest and established company would give a guarantee that long. Most only give 30 days. And it must be everything we say it is. If it wasn't, we would be foolish to offer such a long guarantee.
35. So because your decision to buy from us is totally risk-free, you won't be any worse off if you tried it then asked for a refund. And your startup capital is totally protected.
36. You can run Miracle Dress Designer from the disc, if you haven't much space on your hard drive. And if you load it from the disc, you won't lose your program if your PC crashes.
37. So your business is totally protected and neither your income nor your family will suffer.
38. If you get stuck, you can get help and advice. So you'll never be left on your own. We make sure you won't have to struggle to learn your business.
39. This will establish your business faster and you'll start earning faster.
40. You'll automatically become a member of the Miracle Dress Maker Club newsletter. With tips and tricks on all aspects of running a home dressmaking business, you'll keep up-to-date on everything in the dressmaking and fashion industry.
41. So you'll design the most up-to-date garments for your customers, and they'll return to you for the latest fashions.
42. You'll build a larger base of loyal customers, and you'll get more repeat orders and referrals. And make more money, of course, to provide even more luxuries for your family.

Hey, just a minute! We had 106 features and benefits. So why are there only 42 now? We linked them together.

What are the strengths of our draft sales message... er, sorry... of our benefits list?

- It's saturated with benefits.
- It tells our reader what's in it for her.
- It tells her that our product satisfies her every need.
- It promises to give her everything she wants.

In fact, even in its present raw form, our list-cum-sales-draft is a hundred times better than the majority of finished copy our reader has seen on her frustrating travels around the Web.

Great start! But now comes the part that will really make it shine: the polish. It's important to remain in the mindset as we polish our benefits list into the most persuasive sales message she has ever seen.

Remember AIDA? No, it's not an opera! Attention. Interest. Desire. Action.

This offline copywriting acorn is one that makes the transition to the Internet intact. It's essential to writing successful copy. It's advice that's so much easier said than done. But due to our techniques, it just got a whole lot easier!

Our headline has already grabbed her Attention. Here comes the next step. Increase and retain her Interest. Glue her rear onto her seat and her eyes to the screen until we've delivered our complete message.

How? With...

10.7.1. Our Opening Paragraph

Did you notice how our headline flows easily into our subheading?

It's the same way our reader's Attention needs to be drawn quickly and smoothly into our opening statement. We have her attention, but she's certainly skeptical. Now it's time to smoothly convert skepticism into Interest.

So let's get back to her mindset. It's just her and us two. So what's going through her mind? She's looking for the answer to her problem, right?

How's she feeling? She's looked at so many opportunities that she's becoming cynical, confused and frustrated.

How's her attitude? Despondent? She has read all the hard sell copy, and anything resembling hype is now invisible. She just doesn't know whom to trust!

At this point, perhaps, she's looking for a reliable friend, someone who will take her by the hand and explain exactly how her problem can be resolved.

We've just grabbed her attention with...

"At Last, the Totally Risk Free Way for Busy Homemakers Like You to Earn Extra Money"

"The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Is the Fun Way to Enjoy the Totally Risk-Free Satisfaction of Making $100 - $200 a Week For Those Little Extras Without Affecting Your Family Life"

So what's she thinking now?

Does she assume this is yet another over-hyped business opportunity? Or is she thinking that this, at first glance, may be offering everything she wants? Does a small bell in her mind begin to ring? Or does she immediately sit bolt upright and shout "Fantastic! This is everything I've been looking for. Where do I order?"

What's actually happening? A little voice in her subconscious is saying, "Hey, they're talking to me! I hope this is the answer. Probably not! I hope this site doesn't let me down, too. I'll give them a few seconds of my time to tell me a bit more!"

Listen. Did you hear what she said? 'I hope this is the answer!'

She's searching the Web once again, hoping she'll find the solution. But she's doubtful, too. Big time! So she also says, "I'll give them a few seconds of my time to tell me a bit more!"

And that's our challenge now, my brilliant copywriting partner. Our opening must, in just a few seconds, convert skepticism into interest. It must do more than just tell her what she needs to know. It must tell her what she wants to hear. This is the answer!

So how do you think she'll feel if we open with the following?

It's absolutely true. Miracle Dress Designer is guaranteed to make you $200 a week, or we give you your money back. Once you start using this amazing program you'll be staggered to find how easy it is to earn $10,000 a year and more in your spare time. In fact, it's so simple that anyone can do it!

Well, it contains most of what she needs but it's a bit strong, don't you think? It's not flat-out hype, but the words may seem familiar to her.

Our headline has lowered her defenses slightly. But this opening paragraph doesn't do anything to lower her "cynicism barrier." Not when she feels that she's read this before somewhere.

She wants to hear the voice of a trustworthy friend. Read the paragraph above. Would you talk to a friend like that?

Borderline. Let's speak to her in a warm, friendly voice, and offer her a big benefit, the complete solution to her problem! The best way to keep her attention, and increase her interest, is to keep firing our biggest guns, right from the start.

Still in her mindset? This woman has been looking for a while and is becoming somewhat frustrated and maybe even a little desperate. So how about these words?

Hi.

If you're becoming frustrated in the search for your ideal home business, could this be the perfect answer?

Sound good? Well, it's warm and friendly. She'll identify her problem right away. It intensifies her curiosity. And it leads her seamlessly into our sales message. A touch manipulative and abrupt, perhaps. Let's add one more reassuring touch.

Our client, the owner of the magnificent "Miracle Dress Designer" (MDD) and the person paying our (huge) bill, is Janice Tripp. Our "ideal" customer is also a woman. And the product is a friendly, touchy-feely one.

How many of those other sites started a bit of relationship right away? None, I'd wager. Let's do so right off the top, like this...

Hi,

I'm Janice Tripp.

If you're like many of my friends, you may be searching for the perfect blend of extra income, personal outlet, and increased family benefits. If you're becoming frustrated in the search for your ideal home business, I may have the perfect solution for you.

Warmer? Reassuring? But still gets the USP across, doesn't it? If she doesn't read deeper, she simply is not in our target market.

Now let's build on it...

10.7.2. Next-Level Benefits Build Interest

Read through our linked benefit list again. But this time, read them one at a time. Bear in mind that we should keep firing our biggest guns first.

We have to intensify her Interest. How? Keep promising what she really wants. Let's identify the biggest benefits to fire at her straight away.

Note: I've chosen what I think are the biggest benefits, and retained the numbers so you can see at a glance where they've been selected from.

You may consider other benefits to be more suitable. But for now, just humor me, partner. See if you agree...

1. The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Package contains everything you will ever need to start and run your very own home business.
2. So you'll learn how to make extra money working from home, and still spend the time you need with your family.
4. Owning your own dress design business means you'll be able to afford to give your family the higher standard of living you know they deserve.
5. We're so confident that you will like it that you have the chance to try it out, without risking a dime. After 30 days, you'll know for certain whether it's everything you want for your ideal home business.
6. And if it's not what you want, you've risked nothing....
7. It means you can start your own business immediately and your family will begin to enjoy those extras within days.
8. You need no knowledge of computers. Just point and click. So you don't have to learn a new skill. And you'll save days or even weeks of hard work usually needed just to get started. So you won't be distracted from your family life.
10. The Miracle Dress Designer is so unique that you need no previous experience designing dresses or sewing. So you don't have to learn a new profession. Just point and click to design 250 custom styles of ladies' and children's fashions, in any size.
22. You'll produce garments quicker than with other software without the nagging worry about having to spend more money on another brand of software in the future.

Now, continuing in the same voice as our opening sentence, let's rewrite the strongest points of these benefits into an opening paragraph or two. Let's make sure that we give her everything she wants.

How about this?

Hi,

I'm Janice Tripp.

If you're like many of my friends, you may be searching for the perfect blend of extra income, personal outlet, and increased family benefits. If you're becoming frustrated in the search for your ideal home business, I may have the perfect solution for you.

Miracle Dress Designer gives you everything you'll ever need to start and run your own successful home business, and still have all the time you need to spend with your family. Better time, too... because there'll be some extra cash for treats and vacations. With enough left over for all the school "extras."

You need no knowledge of computers. No experience designing dresses or sewing. No highly specialized skills. And...

Since it takes just 30 minutes to install and learn, you'll have your very own home business up and running immediately. So in just a few short days, you'll be bringing extra income into the family... while doing something that's also a rewarding personal outlet.

Take a peek at what other part-time businesswomen have had to say about MDD. As one MDD Home Business owner said...

"It is the ideal fun and easy way to earn an extra $100 to $200 every week, without affecting family life in any way."

In fact, we're so confident that you can do the same that we invite you to try it out for yourself, ABSOLUTELY FREE!

No catch, no strings, no hidden costs. If it's not exactly what you want, you don't buy it!

Sounds great to me. How about you?

OK, just one more step to go. Now let's...

10.7.3. Add More Impact

The Internet is a hard, cruel place when it comes to competition. To be successful, we need every ounce of selling punch we can muster. So let's keep building...

A picture, they say, paints a thousand words. Advertisers have known for decades that a photograph can add significantly to the impact and profitability of their advertising. But you have to be careful. Ensure that the picture you choose supports and reinforces your sales message.

And on the Web, it's essential that all pictures be optimized to load quickly. Your "ideal" customer isn't going to wait 10 seconds with bated breath to view your masterpiece. So only add pictures to your web sales pages if they support and reinforce your message.

There are no other sales reasons to add pictures or graphics to your web pages. Don't allow yourself to be swayed by the pretty, artistically illustrated websites you often visit. Let them decide whether it helps their sales!

We're building our Miracle Dress Designer website with one specific objective, and only one... to SELL!

Leave our competitors to provide the entertainment!

Ken's Notes...

Add pictures to your sales pages if they support and reinforce your message.

There are lots of good reasons for including graphics, easy navigation and attractive design to enrich your PREselling content.

Read Make Your Content PREsell! for more details.

So what kind of picture should we use to achieve these two objectives? Back to our customer's mindset again. (Another 100 times and you'll have the mindset habit!)

Will a photograph of a successful Miracle Dress Designer businesswoman in an executive suit connect with her? No! That's not the lifestyle she needs.

How about a happy smiling woman working at her home sewing machine? Closer! But it's still not what she wants. She wants her family to enjoy a better standard of living, without sacrificing her quality time with them.

How do you think she'll feel if she reads our headline, and sees a picture of a happy mom enjoying her improved lifestyle with her family? Perhaps the mom is on holiday, or driving the new family car. Will she identify with it? Yes!

Will it help her to visualize her lifestyle after she starts using MDD? Yes.

Will our web page welcome her with a warm, friendly greeting? Yes.

Will it help to lower her "cynicism barrier"? Yes.

And most importantly, will it enhance and reinforce our message? Yes!

OK. Why don't we try it? If it doesn't work, we can always drop it! We'll save it towards the end, where it instinctively seems more fitting.

For the beginning, here's a better idea. We've already introduced our boss, Janice Tripp. So why not show her who this wonderful woman (who hasn't paid us yet!) is?

This is another reassurance tactic that has been used successfully by offline direct marketers for decades. Yet it's rarely used on the Web. Why? Because they don't know how truly powerful it can be!

Do it right, though...

- Make a quality smile, and that includes your sparkling, happy, trustworthy eyes!
- Use only head and shoulders. Playing on the beach with the kids is a no-no!
- Your eyes should look straight at your reader.
- Your head should always be inclined towards the center of the page.
- No moustaches or beards. Why? It's been accepted for many years that readers tend to distrust people in photographs with moustaches or beards! That's why you rarely see politicians wearing them! Since our boss is Janice Tripp, we have no problem! In fact, both men and women feel a greater sense of trust when they see a woman's photo.

OK. Let's see what we have now...

"At Last, the Totally Risk-Free Way for Busy Homemakers Like You to Earn Extra Money"

"The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business
Is the Fun Way to Enjoy the Totally Risk-Free
Satisfaction of Making $100 - $200 a Week For Those Little Extras Without Affecting Your Family Life"

Hello, I'm Janice Tripp. [Janice's photo]

If you're like many of my friends, you may be searching for the perfect blend of extra income, personal outlet, and increased family benefits. If you're becoming frustrated in the search for your ideal home business, I may have the perfect solution for you.

Miracle Dress Designer gives you everything you'll ever need to start and run your own successful home business, and still have all the time you need to spend with your family. Better time, too... because there'll be some extra cash for treats and vacations. With enough left over for all the school "extras."

You don't need any knowledge of computers.

Zero experience designing dresses or sewing required.

And I'll show you all you need to know. If you have absolutely no special skills, no problem.

Since it takes just 30 minutes to install and learn, you'll have your very own home business up and running immediately.

So in just a few short days, you'll be bringing extra income into the family... while doing something that's also a rewarding personal outlet.

Take a peek at what other part-time businesswomen have had to say about MDD. As one MDD Home Business owner said..

"It's the ideal fun and easy way to earn an extra $100 to $200 every week, without affecting family life in any way."

In fact, we're so confident you can do the same, we invite you to try it out for yourself, ABSOLUTELY FREE!

No catch, no strings, no hidden costs. If it's not exactly what you want, you don't buy it!

This does the job. Are we in agreement? Remember, this is just our introduction, not the complete sales message.

What's that, partner? You'd rather do it over again, and come up with something even better? Terrific, you're turning into a real copywriter!

I'm sure you can because it's easy to come up with several good approaches. Then have a few friends who fit the profile of your target market read all of them. Ask them to rank them in order of preference. And ask for comments.

Go ahead. Do it! I've got to count and match my socks tonight, so I won't be able to help. Write one better headline, opening paragraph, and a few more paragraphs.

You have plenty of benefits to work with, so I'm sure you can write an opening with an even stronger message. And after you've finished, we'll come up with lots more subheadings.

We'll need them when we write the rest of our sales message. The sales message is known as the body copy. Which, by the greatest of coincidences, is where we have reached...

10.8. Show Your Great Body

"There is a universal belief in lay circles that people won't read long copy. Nothing could be farther from the truth."

- David Ogilvy, Founder of one of the world's largest ad agencies

Before we go any further, it's time for a quick review. What do we have so far?

- An eye-catching and intriguing headline.
- A persuasive subheading announcing our USP.
- A friendly and welcoming opening sentence.
- A reassuring photo identifying our lovely boss, Janice Tripp.
- An intro that connects with our customer’s mindset and establishes key benefits.
- A half dozen benefit-saturated, fast moving short sentences promising everything she wants.

So we’ve fired our biggest guns first and grabbed her Attention. And we’ve managed to stimulate her Interest to learn more. Now what?

Well, this is the point where many marketers let her down. They fire a great big gun in the form of a massive promise, often a promise that’s obviously undeliverable. They attack her with a barrage of hype and features. Then they run out of ammunition!

But our tactics are different. Thanks to the SWAT? technique, we have lots of “ammunition” in reserve... powerful sales-generating ammunition in the form of an arsenal of benefits. And to convince her to deliver our MWR, we must retain the initiative by “firing” until the “battle” is won.

Battle? Is this a war? Not as we know it. It’s not even a game of chess. In war and chess, the victor forces his adversary into submission. But we’re not in the enforcement business. You and I are persuaders.

Still, our visitor does have a natural resistance that we have to overcome. So there’s a kind of “battle” going on, but it’s soft. It’s a battle of the mind, for her mind. We aren’t trying to fool or force her into doing anything.

Let’s boil it down. We have a product that delivers certain benefits. Our job is to present those benefits in their best possible light, as clearly as possible. Then anticipate and overcome objections.

If our product is simply not for her, she makes an appropriate rejection. If she does want the benefits that our product delivers, we make the sale. Simple.

So let’s develop this self-image for ourselves... we’re persuaders. Which brings us to one of our biggest advantages...

Many of our competitors see the selling business in a different light. They attempt to secure her business with adversarial tactics. They try to browbeat her into buying.

“Buy mine,” they shout. “Mine is the best choice,” they scream. “Look what I have,” they demand. “We’re far superior to the others,” they boast. “Spend your money with me, me, me!," they plead. They believe they're engaged in a war for her money, in an exercise to pull dollars from her credit card.

That's why they lose! They don't realize that by shouting too much, they may as well be firing blanks. Because eventually she becomes deaf!

Bottom line? No one ever wins an argument. You can't force someone to agree with you. But you can persuade them!

10.8.1. Persuasion Is the Key

As a persuader, you employ the tactics of diplomacy and the power of persuasion. You're engaged in the battle for her mind.

By firing our big "guns," we have gained her Attention. So we must keep on firing to retain it and increase her Interest in our product, stimulate her Desire to possess it, and persuade her to take the necessary Action to own it.

And, as ammunition, we use benefits from our list! We pile on benefit upon benefit. That's because as she reads our message, her mindset is constantly throwing up a barrage of objections.

This is her defense. She will not easily turn her mind to our side. She protects herself against making the wrong decision.

At this point, we've already read her mindset and our preparation has forewarned us of her defensive tactics. As a result, each benefit we fire will answer her objection before it is raised.

We know that objections are actually questions in disguise! So we must relentlessly deliver a stream of relevant information, and deliver a sales message that answers her every question and reinforces our promise to give her everything she wants.

File this in your memory...

Whatever you promise her, and no matter how persuasive your writing is, remember that each word, each sentence and every single phrase has to SELL!

And what are we selling? The Most Wanted Response! Is it to persuade her to buy MDD? Well, that would be nice, but considering her mindset, she's hardly likely to buy from us on her first visit.

Our job is easier than that. The MWR is to persuade her to download her 30-DAY FREE TRIAL. Once she does that, she takes home our puppy dog. And with a carefully prepared follow-up system, our chances of making the sale are multiplied a hundred fold.

Here's why...

After she takes it into her home, she plays with it. She nurtures it. She becomes attached to it. She falls in love with it. After all, she now has everything she wants. Then 30 days later, we come along and threaten to take it away from her unless she buys it!

Powerful approach. And it's honest and ethical. If our product is bad, she simply deletes MDD from her hard drive. If it meets all our benefit statements, she's more than delighted to buy it.

OK, let's start writing the body copy. We have our list of benefits that contains all the information she needs. As you recall, it's an excellent benefit-saturated sales message already! And all we have to do now is re-arrange them into an inverted pyramid.

An inverted pyramid simply means arranging our benefits by placing the biggest at the top, and listing them down the page in their order of importance.

This, however, doesn't mean they should fizzle out at the bottom. As we get near to that position, we have to raise her motivation, get to the point, and finish with a wallop!

And what is that point? To persuade her to download, of course!

So let's keep our copy sharp and targeted and don't wander from the subject. Keep it crystallized and focused. Each benefit should flow easily and seamlessly into the next.

OK. So far, we've grouped our list of benefits into individual chunks of information. And each chunk is a self-contained small block of copy dealing with one particular subject. We'll polish them later.

Right now, though, we need something to link our list of chunks. We need something to attract her Attention, and raise sufficient Interest to encourage her to flow into each section, especially if she's scanning.

In other words, it's time to write some...

10.8.2. Subheadings

A subheading should intensify our reader's interest and curiosity, by explaining the content of the following chunk.

Short and punchy, a subheading has to lead/pull our visitor smoothly into the next part of our sales message. The most effective way to do that is to analyze each chunk of copy and create a mini-headline, in much the same way that we created the main headline for the top of the page.

These mini-headlines also help us to slow our reader down, in case she scans too quickly to absorb our message. What's the most important thing to remember? If our reader scans quickly down the page, the subheadings should read like a brief overview of our complete sales message.

Review the previous discussions about headlines and subheadings. Then it will be time to get to work and create our subheading glue for the chunks.

Do a few now, and then compare them with the ones we'll do together in the final copy below.

10.8.3. The Body Copy

Once we have the subheadings done, the whole project takes on a life of its own. We already have our “benefit chunks.” All we have to do is stay inside our customer’s mindset and follow the guidelines of Copywriting 101 and 102 as we polish that copy more and more.

Tighten up the sentences. Activate the language. Add variety by mixing shorter paragraphs with longer ones. By the time we finish it, it will be so good that you and I will end up buying a copy!

If everything up to now has been done right, this is the easiest part of the whole project. Of course, if you’re a perfectionist, you can turn this into major labor as you search for the absolutely perfect word or turn of phrase. You have to know when to stop. After a certain point, only you notice.

Once you think it’s done, read it aloud to friends who meet your target market profile, then customers. If you (or your friends or your customers) choke on certain points, they’re weak. Fix and repeat until you’re happy.

All done? Terrific!

Whoops! Not quite. We have to lead our visitor smoothly to the order page (or the download page in this case).

10.8.4. Our Last Obstacle... A Big One!

We have one last hurdle to jump over before we put this all together. The close! That’s “sales-speak” for asking for the order.

Never forget that the whole purpose of writing our sales message is to persuade our reader to buy our invitation to download her 30-day free trial. If we don’t ask her to download, I can guarantee one thing. She won’t!

Asking for the order isn’t simply a case of saying, “Buy Now.” This is the most critical point of the selling process. It’s crunch time! If we fail now, all our efforts will have been wasted (and Janice Tripp may stiff us for the bill). Let’s not blow it now.

If there's the slightest objection that hasn't been overcome, or any question that we haven't answered, this is the moment when our potential customer will procrastinate. And this is the very last chance we'll have to reassure her.

Let's imagine her mindset one more time as she reads through our sales message. She realizes that she's nearing decision time. If we've done our job right, she's slightly relieved at finding what she really wants.

- She's getting excited at the thought of setting up her own business.
- She's content that her in-built objections are being answered.
- She's beginning to picture herself earning those extra dollars.
- She's almost made up her mind to "take the plunge."

But then what happens? What do we all do? She wants to think about it. Arggggggh!

Ken's Notes...

What's the #1 problem after a site does everything correctly and all the common reasons (for example, lack of security or poor design) are eliminated?

Procrastination. It becomes a gigantic reason for not buying. Don't ever give your customer a reason to procrastinate or think about it.

Well, can you really blame her? After all, she's never done this before. And even though the trial is free, she still needs a little courage to raise her finger and press that download button.

Your customer needs something most of us need in similar situations. She needs a little push. She needs encouragement. She wants reassurance that this is the right decision. She needs to be convinced that our home business opportunity is superior to anything else she's seen.

We're so close to getting our MWR (the free download), we can taste it. So partner, by all means...

10.8.5. Don't Let Her Think About It

If we allow her to think about it, our chances of making a sale are drastically reduced. Something that's almost sold is invariably never sold. There's no such thing as an "almost sale."

How many times have you delayed buying something until later, and never bought at all? Or perhaps some time afterwards, you saw a similar item somewhere else, and spent your money there instead?

Those six words... “I want to think about it”... are heard by salesmen every working day of their lives. They, of course, have the skill and experience to overcome this by adjusting their presentation. They know that a stall is a disguised objection. And an objection is really an unanswered question.

We all have a tendency to stall. We all have a natural resistance to committing ourselves on impulse, because we’ve been “burned” too many times.

Since we’re not face to face with our reader, we have to anticipate her stall and ensure our sales copy overcomes her objections before they arise. We want to lead her smoothly into a buying mode.

So as she draws to the end of our sales message, we must motivate her into pressing that button... So far...

Our sales message has promised her everything she wants. Our introduction has helped lower her defense and raise her hopes. The huge list of benefits has reassured her. The 12-month guarantee and excellent after-sales backup have persuaded her we’re a reputable company.

Translation? She’s ready to buy. In fact, she wants to buy! And all she needs is a little persuasion. So we need to trigger the response button that will help her do what she really wants to do.

How? Stay focused on her mindset.

Can you understand how she’s feeling at this moment? Haven’t you been in exactly the same position yourself? Haven’t you wanted to buy something, or tried to decide on a color, then asked a friend for her opinion? And when she agreed with you, weren’t you delighted?

You needed to justify in your mind that you were making a logical decision, and not simply being carried away with emotion. You’d already decided what to do and all you needed was a little nudge. And the nudge was actually the reassurance that your decision was the right one.

Now it’s time for us to find the right words to nudge our customer. We need to reassure her that her gut feeling to push that download button is the right decision.

And how can we do that?

10.8.6. Repeat the Pain, Then Show the Gain

Remind our customer of her problem, and then repeat our biggest benefit, which in this case is our USP. Tell her once more that MDD will give her everything she wants. At that point she’ll realize that if she doesn’t download now, her problem and her pain will remain.

By reminding her of the consequences of not deciding now, we'll trigger the response she wants. And, of course, the response we want, which is for her to click on that download button!

So now, let's finally...

10.9. Ask for the Most Wanted Response and Get It

"Our doubts are traitors, and make us lose the good we oft might win by fearing to attempt."
- William Shakespeare

Good news. We've achieved our Most Wanted Response and our "ideal" customer has downloaded her free 30-day trial. Terrific!

So we sent her three or four irresistible follow-up emails by autoresponder and are now waiting for her to place her order. After all, MDD is everything she wants, and once she starts using it, it will sell itself.

Our ultimate MWR, our sole reason for being in business, is to sell the package. What we've done so far, though, is to lend it out and persuade her to visit our website's order page. Our ideal customer still hasn't ordered yet!

So what happens when she decides to place her order? Does she just return to our website all fired up and type in her credit card details?

It's time to zoom in to our customer's mindset and check out exactly what's happening. She's downloaded MDD, used it, and has decided it's everything she wants. Then, just as she's becoming really attached to it 30 days later, the software is inactivated and she receives a message to order the product.

So we email her three or four motivational follow-up emails to get her to our order page. And then, clutching her credit card, she enters her personal details, clicks on "Buy Now," and becomes the proud owner of MDD.

Hmmm, lovely scenario, but it's usually doesn't work that way!

Let's look at some hard facts. Surveys tell us that a significantly high proportion of potential Internet buyers fill in the order form, but falter at the last hurdle. They take the time and the trouble to enter all their personal details but they don't click the Buy button. They get cold feet and walk away!

Of course, they intend to buy. They want to buy. And they're sure they will buy... some time in the future! But many of them don't! Not today.

Yes, they tell themselves they'll come back soon, but they never seem to get round to it. Or they wander off somewhere else and perhaps make an impulse buy from another site. Or, maybe, never buy at all!

Once that order form is out of sight, it's also out of mind. And another potential sale bites the dust. We're not just talking about "tire kickers" here. We're talking about ordinary, everyday human beings just like you and me! These are folks on the verge of buying.

Yet it's not difficult to understand why this happens. Just recall your own experiences of when this happened to you. It has happened to you, hasn't it?

In many cases, the ordering process is too complicated. It's as if the customer has to pass an initiative test just to place her order!

In other cases, too little attention is given to the nitty-gritty details. Sometimes the customer is left to worry because someone didn't fully explain a seemingly minor detail like "your credit card information is totally secure."

Well, this is positive news for us. Because there's a good chance that this is happening on our competitors' sites. We'll address those potential pitfalls in just a moment.

Now wouldn't it be good to know why so many people leave without ordering, even when those obstacles aren't present? What makes someone in that situation lose her nerve? After all, we've all done it.

Once you know why it happens, you can take the necessary steps to help your reader keep her feet warm and cozy. And what's always the first step?

Go back to your reader's mindset again. (I told you it would get easier.) Now imagine how she's feeling...

She loves MDD. She's impressed with the Club newsletter, and she's convinced it's everything she wants. "I'll buy this," she thinks, as she approaches the Buy Now button. But she hesitates!

She wants to buy it but her buying finger hovers nervously. Come on now, you've been there. How did you feel? Can't you sense her nervousness?

She's hesitating. Pressing that button means she has to make a final commitment to spend her hard-earned cash, and she hasn't got a lot to spare. She wants to earn extra money, not spend it. And once she clicks, she's burned her bridges with no going back. "Should I, or shouldn't I?" she thinks. "What if?" "Yes, but how...?"

Hmmm. Time for us to figure out...

10.9.1. What the Heck Is Happening?

If there's one thing guaranteed to test our commitment, it's asking us to back our opinions with cash. Opinions cost nothing. That's why they're so freely given.

But try getting in someone's face. Ask them to "Put your money where your mouth is." That separates the dreamers from the doers.

So what does our customer need to help her clear the final hurdle? Well, more information can help. But she's already been given a bucketful.

Reassurance will certainly boost her confidence. But she's tried the product and she loves it. What then is holding her back? Look, you've been there. We've all been there. Put yourself into her mindset by reliving how you felt the last time you were in the same situation.

Her finger is hovering, but what's happening in her mind? Her defense mechanism has kicked in again. That nagging voice inside is making itself heard once more. "Take your time girl," it whispers. "What's the hurry? Are you really sure?" it wonders.

"Have you explored every avenue? Is there anything you've missed?" she agonizes. "Are you absolutely convinced that this is the right decision?" "Is there a catch you haven't spotted?" her inner voice nags. "It's a lot of money. Are you sure there isn't a cheaper version somewhere else?" Then she hears those dreaded words. It's her last defense.

"Why not think about it?"

Argggggh! Again! You and I both know what can happen if she does that! It's not logic that's causing the indecision. It's her emotions! We're not trying to commit her to something she doesn't want.

We know MDD will solve her problems and she knows it will solve her problems. Logic tells her to buy, and her gut feeling tells her the same. But that irritating subconscious voice whispers just enough to cast a doubt.

What does she need to silence that annoying little voice? A tiny bit of extra courage! So it's up to us to help her find it. How?

By giving her the reassurance of...

10.9.2. A Second Opinion

Consider this. If a friend were right there, advising your customer to go ahead, would she hesitate? If her pal urged to "go for it, girl," would her finger still hover?

Think of how you shop with your spouse. You agonize over a nice shirt. You ask your spouse how it looks. "Beautiful, darling." KA-CHING!

Unfortunately, neither your customer's spouse nor her pal is present. However, we are. So it's up to us to give her the second opinion she's seeking and the reassurance and encouragement that confirms she's making the right decision.

We've already achieved that once with our sales message. Wasn't she inspired and motivated enough to "buy" our free download? So do the same again!

We don't have to present her with our whole sales message, though. This time, everything is a lot easier. Because when she returns to our website, she will probably read our copy again before clicking onto the order page. At that point...

She's already 99% committed. She's already made her mind up and wants to click that button. All she needs is a reassuring arm around her shoulder and a gentle nudge!

The greatest weapon in our arsenal is that we know she wants to buy! And we know she'll buy with her emotions, not from logic. So just before we ask her to commit herself, why don't we give her the second opinion that she seeks, and stir her emotions?

This means...

- Repeating our USP.
- Emphasizing the benefits of our risk-free money-back guarantee.
- Reassuring her that her decision will permanently solve her problem and cure her pain.
- Agreeing with her that MDD will provide her with everything she wants.
- Replacing the negative voice in her mind with a positive mind picture of her and her family enjoying the benefits that running her own MDD Home Business will bring.

Does that sound complicated? Trust me, it's not. In fact, it's incredibly easy!

We must make the ordering process as smooth and as painless as humanly possible. She's feeling nervous. And even though she's keen to buy, that infuriating inner voice is still lurking at the back of her mind.

The tiniest distraction or obstacle may be all it takes for that nagging voice to make itself heard again. So we have to take her by the hand and tell her what to do. And show her how to do it.

We have to explain the tiniest detail, right down to choosing the words "Buy Now" on the magic button. (You wouldn't ask her to "Submit," would you?)

We must highlight the advantages of using our secure server.

We have to avoid forcing her to click through too many pages to complete her order. Each click causes unnecessary delay and another opportunity for her to hesitate.

We must concentrate on maintaining a smooth but no-pressure flow from our headline right through to the button. Because the slightest delay, distraction, or unclear instruction will break the rhythm and could cost us the sale.

Think about the techniques of the professionals. When a professional salesman is face-to-face with his customer, he will allow nothing to interrupt his closing presentation.

If the phone rings, he'll cancel it. If someone tries to attract his attention, he'll ignore her. If his trash container catches fire, he'll douse it with coffee and carry on closing! He's totally focused on his MWR, the sale, and he will not deviate from his objective.

This pro knows from bitter experience that he should never count his winnings while the cards are still on the table! He's savvy enough to know that however motivated his customer may be, however good his sales pitch is, and no matter how sweet the offer is, the deal is never done until the signature is on the order.

As soon as he spots the buying signal, he hones in like a laser and allows nothing to distract him or his prospect. He even hands the pen to his customer, points to the signature box, and says, "Just OK it for me right there!"

And that's the way it must be with us. Our customer has already given the buying signal by clicking through to the order form. Now it's up to us to close the deal by going back to our tried and trusted SWAT? list.

While still remaining in her mindset, just "pick and mix" the most appropriate benefits to write the most persuasive "greeting" possible on your order page. Ready?

"The Totally Risk-Free Way to Own Your Very Own Miracle Dress Designer Home Business"

Hello,

It's Janice Tripp again.

If you're like many of my friends, you may be searching for the perfect blend of extra income, personal outlet, and increased family benefits. If you're becoming frustrated in the search for your ideal home business, I may have the perfect solution for you.

Now that you've experienced MDD in the comfort of your own home, I'm sure you'll agree that this is the ideal home business to help you earn the extra cash you need for yourself and your family.

(USP) In fact, I'm convinced you'll agree that MDD is the perfect fun way of earning an extra $100-$200 a week for all those little extras you would dearly love to provide for them.

And without any disruption to family life!

And remember – it's totally RISK-FREE! Because...

"If within 12 months, and for any reason whatsoever, you feel that the Miracle Dress Designer Home Business is not for you, simply return it to us and receive a full and courteous refund. No questions asked!"

So you see, with the total confidence of our cast-iron guarantee and the backing of our highly professional support team, we've gone to great lengths to ensure your unqualified success.

To join the thousands of other successful MDD business owners, every one of whom started just like you, simply click on the "Secure Order Page" button and you'll be taken to our Secure Order Page.

The total security of our ordering system guarantees your details are kept absolutely safe and confidential.

So just fill in the few details required and follow the simple instructions. Within minutes we'll email your personal password. It will unlock your Miracle Dress Designer Home Business.

Easy-to-follow instructions will be provided, and your business will be up and running immediately.

I think you deserve it. Don't you?

Welcome aboard,

Janice

Just stick to what we know is working, and exploit it to the fullest. And, in this case, it means using the power and persuasion of our SWAT? list of benefits to get our message over, time and time again! If our closer does the job, and it has a good chance, she proceeds to "Download Now!"

(And Janice Tripp might actually pay us!)

Ken's Notes...

It's been fun to see the development of a MWR for a free trial download.

Many sites have a direct MWR. "Get the order! Now!" Since all SiteSell.com sites focus totally on this, here are my thoughts on closing the sale online.

Many people think that their product is so obviously great and that they're so shinningly brilliant, they don't need to "lower themselves" to sell. Wrong! And to those people, I would add, "Sales is a noble and important profession." It's where the action is. Do it well, and your business will thrive. So...

Don't think there's something wrong with asking for the order! Are you offering a great product with outstanding benefits? Do you honor your money-back guarantee? You're offering, when all is said and done, something that will improve your customer's life, and with no risk to her.

Customers, though, tend to resist the sale, especially over the Web. You obviously can't be there with your customer so do your best with the written word. Don't be shy to get the sale!

And don't make the purchase a "close call." Build an irresistible offer and a crystal-clear call to action into your MWR closer page. Specify all the ways that your customer can deliver the MWR, including the response form. Flesh out the closer page with copy and headlines.

Remember, it's "do or die" time. There's only one reason why your customer has made it to your MWR closer page. She's interested.

So many sites finish a pathway with photos and descriptions of the products, and nothing else. There's no clear way to respond. This isn't TV. It's the Web. It's time for your visitor to respond. It's time to close the sale. Whatever your MWR is, it's time to get it!

Finish with an irresistible offer (price, bonuses, and possibly a little time pressure), followed by a strong, clear call to action. Tell your visitor what to do right now. Or, as any good VP Sales person would say... GET THE ORDER!

While you should always be focused on getting the sale, you must be laser-beamed on the MWR closer page.

No dead-end side-branches for more "last second" info. No links to anywhere else on the site. No new highlights. The focus is on getting the order.

One special note about the order page...

While you must build a pathway that builds to the sale, also allow for an entire range of visitors who become “ready to buy” at different times. Connect with the spur-of-the-moment impulse buyer and the ultimate careful shopper!

How do you build a pathway and still allow “ready to go” buyers to jump to your order page? Provide a link to your closer page on every important content page of your site. When you say just the right thing and your customer decides that she wants your offering, she links directly to the closer page and delivers your MWR.

Your MWR closer page must include compelling reasons to respond via the Web. Possibilities include...

- Price: A Web business has low overhead, so you should be able to offer products at a great price. Of course, if you offer unique, high-end products, a low price may not be necessary or even wise.
- Selection: Since you have a virtual store, you may not need to keep physical inventory. That opens up the potential to offer far greater selection than your “real-world” competitor (for example, Amazon.com does not really keep millions of books in inventory).
- Sales information: On your site, you can present the whole story, and answer any question, far better than any sales staff. You can offer the ability to drill down to almost unlimited detail, should the consumer so desire. Build an interactive help desk, email follow-up system, etc.
- Ease/convenience/instant gratification: Ordering anything is just a click away. No need to spend money on gas or time in a “real-world” store. No need to even pick up the phone!
- Distribution edge: Some products, because of their very nature, are best “shipped” via the Web. Software, video games and infoproducts are just a download away.

Work these reasons into the copy of your closer page. But don't hit your customer over the head with them. For example, don't write... Just hit the order button. It's far easier than phoning. You're making a judgment call for your customer, which she'll resist. And it's too pleading. Instead, write... Order now and you'll be downloading in just a minute!

OK, enough general issues. Now let's cover the “Big 3” of the MWR closer page...

The Offer

No matter what your MWR is, your customer had better hit your closer page panting for your product. The offer has to convert that desire into an MWR right here, right now.

Real-world retailers have sales, clearance specials, and/or “limited quantity while supplies last” offers. Direct mail marketers have thousands of techniques to get the order now. But this is the Web, where getting the order is more important than ever.

Why now? On the Internet it’s more fun to seek the surprise of the new, than to return to where you’ve been. Assume your customer will never return, so get the order now!

How?

- Choose just the right price. Pricing is a complicated issue. Keep experimenting until you find the most profitable price (profit-per-unit x # units sold). When it comes to pricing on the Web, creativity, common sense, and a willingness to test are far more important than having read forty books on pricing!
- Sweeten the deal with an irresistible bonus. The trick is to find products with a high-perceived value and low production costs. Infoproducts are a strong first choice since they’re so cheap to produce and distribute.

Examples include reports, video tutorials, and a 30-minute consultation. Your free bonuses should increase the value of your offer to the point where your almost-a-customer thinks, “Geez, I can’t afford not to buy this!”

- Create some way to develop time-anxiety in the reader. The Web provides new and unique ways to build on the concept of time anxiety. Take advantage of the medium.

For example, my PennyGold site told visitors that we were only selling 1,000 copies (which was true, by the way). And that the price would increase as we sold more and more of the units. Many people emailed asking if we had any left... when the price was going up next, etc.

Here’s the important caveat about time-pressure. Don’t cross your customer’s tolerance limits into “used-car salesman” territory. Phony, overly aggressive tactics smell bad and will cost you sales. Be creative. If you can’t find a fit that smells OK, definitely don’t use this high-pressure technique. It has to be natural, not forced.

To summarize...

A well-crafted offer combines product, price and bonuses in such a way that the customer can easily justify the purchase price. It also does it in such a way that it creates an intense buy now urgency.

Repeat the highlights to your customer (people forget)...

- Key benefits... Highlight how great it will feel to have and use this product. (Make her feel it all over again.)
- Your guarantee... Reinforce that this purchase is risk-free.
- Testimonials... Add a couple of brilliant, convincing ones here.
- Your USP... Re-establish your USP. There must be strong reasons to buy from you in particular (exclusivity, credibility, etc.).

Re-read your offer. If you're convinced that it more than justifies the price in the customer's mind, you're almost home.

Next?

The Call to Action

Do you remember what MWR stands for? That's right, Most Wanted Response.

Have you ever been to a site where you say to yourself, "What was he selling? Anything?" I certainly have, and some have even been Internet marketing sites! Somehow you're just supposed to know what they're selling!

Don't assume that people know your MWR. Tell them exactly what to do. That's what's meant by the "call to action."

It's not enough for her to agree with you. She has to deliver the MWR! If you want your customer to buy or subscribe (or whatever), don't figure that she knows this. She's waiting to be told what to do. If you don't tell her exactly what you want her to do, you've left too much room for error.

Never assume. Ask for the order. Tell her what to do exactly. Get the MWR... that's why you put up your site.

Next?

The "How-To's" of the MWR Itself

The moment of decision! Your customer has done it all. She came down the pathway and entered your MWR closer page. She read the offer. Your call to action told her what to do. She's about to do it. Don't blow it now. Offer every way possible for your customer to deliver your MWR.

The bottom line? Different people are comfortable with different methods. Let your customer order however she likes... via email, secure order form, 1-800 or 1-888 phone call (amazingly cheap to offer), mail or fax order (create a printable order form). Hey, let her sky-write it if she wants.

And let her pay however she likes... credit card, money order, even barter for chickens.

Credit cards are the most popular payment method, which brings us to the importance of secure servers. If your MWR is a straight-off-the-Web sale, you must be able to accept credit card orders directly via the Web. Your customers will want their credit card info to be safe and sound.

So put your pages on a server with SSL security, which encrypts the information. This is what's known as a secure server. Realize though that you're not really doing this for reasons of security.

Customers relax when they see that lock icon in the browser, indicating a secure credit card transaction.

Studies have shown that logos of recognized companies reassure greatly. VISA, MasterCard and AMEX logos reassure Web shoppers. We don't use the credit card that they select. Why? Because it's redundant -- this information is contained in the credit card number itself! The logo is just for reassurance.

Phew! Almost done. Remember, three things on the closer/order page... the offer, the call to action, and the response form. And they should all be on the same Web page. Don't make your customer click again. Not at this critical point.

An important final word about your closer page... No matter how your customer delivers your MWR, make it a fast, easy, clear, one-step process. In other words, K-I-S-S. Here's why...

Most customers will have last-second hesitations. If you make the process complicated or prolonged or confusing or vague, you'll lose responses. Don't do anything to make your about-to-buy customer hesitate or think twice.

Review your ordering process. How hard is it to place an order? Is the MWR response form clear in design, and are the instructions clear? Or do you have 12 optional fields, "conveniently" marked with red asterisks?

Don't bother. No one fills in optional fields anyway and it just makes a big mess of your form. For example, one of the most common mistakes on sales sites is asking for too much info. People don't like providing info. It makes your response form look like work. What do you think happens? Yup, lost orders. So ask for the least amount of info necessary.

For a credit card purchase, you only need first and last name, street address (for extra security), name on the credit card, card number and expiration date, and the CVV -- the 3 digit number on the back of the card (4 digits on the front of an American Express card). Don't ask for more.

It also amazes me how little thought is given to the wording on the button. “Submit” is common but atrocious (unless your customer is a techie). Use a clear, direct instruction like “Send My Order” or “Submit Order” or “Buy Now!” Nothing fancy is needed.

Privacy statement? I’ll risk being politically incorrect on this. I do use a privacy statement when giving away freebies. People are more suspicious when you hand out something for nothing (“Hey, he’s just trying to get my email address!”) so reassurance is important.

When I’m just on the brink of a sale, I don’t want to remind them about this issue. Most if not all people are just not thinking like this at this time. (In a survey we did to find out why people did not order, not a single person mentioned the lack of a privacy statement, out of 1,000 respondents.)

Done with your closer page for the MWR? Great! Now do the same for your backup response!

Needless to say, the processing of the order is beyond the scope of this publication. Its job to get your visitor to click “Buy Now.” But please remember this... how you handle the order, from data-checking to credit card clearing and fulfilling of the order is “your first date” with your new customer. Blow it now, and it will be your last!

OK. Ready to piece together the jigsaw puzzle?

Against each piece of copy, you’ll see either a number or an abbreviation. Each number identifies a specific benefit from our benefits list. You can see at a glance that, except for the addition of a very few words, our sales message consists almost entirely of our benefits list.

Each benefit has been sharpened. Dead words have been cut out. And some benefits have been slightly reworded to improve the impact and persuasiveness of the message. Like this...

“At Last, the Totally Risk-Free Way for Busy Homemakers Like You to Earn Extra Money”

“The Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Is the Fun Way to Enjoy the Totally Risk-Free Satisfaction of Making $100 - $200 a Week For Those Little Extras Without Affecting Your Family Life”

Hello,

I’m Janice Tripp.

If you're becoming frustrated in the search for your ideal home business, could this be the perfect answer? (Mindset)

Miracle Dress Designer gives you everything you'll ever need to start and run your very own successful home business, and still have all the time you need to spend with your family. (1)

You don't need any knowledge of computers, experience designing dresses or sewing, or special skills. (8)

And as it takes just 30 minutes to install and learn, you'll have your own home business up and running immediately. So in just a few short days you'll be providing your family with all those little extras you know they really deserve. (25)

If you take a look at some of our testimonials, you'll find that MDD Home Business owners find it perfectly easy to earn an extra $100 to $200 every week, without affecting their family lives in any way. (USP)

In fact we're so confident you can do the same, we're inviting you to try it out for yourself absolutely free. (5) (MWR)

No catch, no strings, no hidden costs.

And, if it's not exactly what you want, you don't buy it! (6)

"Everything is in one package"

Your MDD Home Business is specifically designed for the home business beginner. And to help you earn the extra money for all those special things you want from life, we've made absolutely sure you'll need..

No previous business experience. (2)

No specialized sewing experience. (10)

No technical computer skills. (8)

So you see, we really have thought of everything to ensure the success of your home business.

"Just point and click" (8)

MDD's state of the art custom design software eliminates any need for specialized computer knowledge. Just "point and click" to design over 250 custom styles of garment, in any size, from traditional to the very latest in high fashion. MDD even recommends the most appropriate materials to use, guaranteeing totally professional garments every single time. (8,11)

You work at your own pace and hours to suit yourself and your family commitments. Most MDD Home Business owners find that working as little as 10 - 15 hours a week can earn them $150 - $200 easily and enjoyably. MDD really is a FUN way to earn all those extras for yourself and your loved ones. (USP)

"You don't need any special sewing skills" (10)

Limited sewing machine skills? Or even no experience at all?

No problem! (10)

Our unique interactive video tutorials make learning so quick and easy, you'll be amazed at how soon you'll be "up and running."

And MDD's unique pattern generator produces individually designed dress patterns in such a way that the need for complex, highly skilled sewing machine experience is completely eliminated! (28, 19)

In fact, these cleverly designed patterns enable anyone with only one hour's sewing machine experience to produce the most complex and highly professional garments imaginable. (19)

"You don't need business experience" (2)

Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Package comes with our comprehensive, detailed and easy to follow business startup manual, containing everything you need to set up and operate your own successful part-time home business. (2)

Based on our 10-year highly successful experience, this 125 page "how to" business manual covers everything you'll ever need to help you manage your lucrative and extremely enjoyable business, including.. (1)

- Where to start.
- The easy way to find your first customers.
- How to price your designs.
- How to create a steady stream of repeat orders.
- The best and cheapest sources for your materials.
- How to keep accurate accounts.
- How to organize your customer list, and so much more.

"You'll never be left on your own" (41)

You can be sure that running your own business becomes as smooth, as enjoyable, and as profitable as possible. Because as an MDD owner you are automatically enrolled as a Full Member of the exclusive MDD Club absolutely FREE. (41)

This entitles you to free and unlimited access to our online Help Center. And every week you'll receive your free copy of the Club newsletter, jam packed with tips, tricks and articles from top designers and other Club members like you. (41)

By keeping you up-to-date on everything in the Home Dressmaking industry, these weekly updates will help you provide your customers with the most up-to-date designs possible, ensuring a steady stream of repeat orders. Orders that you provide for a mere fraction of retail prices. So your customers benefit both ways. (42, 43)

And you earn a substantial second income for yourself and your family.

"Start without financial sacrifices" (24)

Because you won't suffer the frustrating and time-consuming problems usually associated with starting a new business, you'll be established quickly, smoothly, and painlessly. And MDD's inexpensive cost will be easily recouped within your first few days in business. (26)

At the surprisingly low cost of only $199, I'm sure you'll agree that the Miracle Dress Designer Home Business package is incredible value for such a comprehensive and unique business opportunity. (23)

"12 months no-strings attached Money Back Guarantee" (33)

We're so convinced you'll find MDD is everything we say it is, we make you this cast-iron promise:

"If, within 12 months, and for any reason whatsoever, you feel that the Miracle Dress Designer Home Business is not for you, simply return it to us and receive a full and courteous refund. No questions asked!" (33)

And here's some even better news.

"Try before you buy" (MWR)

Even though we give a full money-back guarantee, we appreciate that choosing your ideal home business can be a daunting task. Starting your own business is a big decision, and you need to be totally convinced you've made the best choice for you.

So we've made it even easier for you.

Now you can try the Miracle Dress Designer Home Business FREE for a full 30 days with our compliments. (5, MWR)

Yes, for a FULL 30 Days you can...

- Use the video tutorials FREE. (28)
- Create your own customized designs FREE. (11)
- Make the garments of your choice FREE. (12)
- Apply the excellent business building guides FREE. (2)
- Use our professional Help Line FREE. (39)
- Enjoy four editions of the MDD Club newsletter FREE. (41)
- Discover how much you can earn from your own fun business FREE. (18)

In fact, use the Miracle Dress Designer Home Business in any way you wish for a full 30 days, absolutely FREE. (5)

And if, after that time, you're not totally convinced it's for you...

Don't buy it! (5)

So it costs you nothing.

No up-front payment.

No worries about making the wrong decision.

In short, the Miracle Dress Designer Home Business Free Trial is the ultimate RISK-FREE way to choose your ideal home business. (USP)

Can we possibly be fairer than that?

Could there possibly be a better way to start your very own enjoyable home business? It's the ideal fun way of earning a minimum of $150 - $200 every week by working just 10 - 15 hours, without affecting your family life in any way. It's the ideal way to provide yourself and your loved ones with all those little extras you know they really deserve... and without any risk to you in the slightest. (USP)

I'm sure your answer is yes. After all, you have nothing to lose.

But imagine how much you and your family will gain!

Click the button below for your FREE 30 DAY TRIAL and start enjoying those extras NOW. (MWR)

Don't you deserve them?

Download Here (MWR)

Well, that's the first part of our sales process successfully completed. The remarkable thing is that, except for a few minor adjustments, the whole of our sales message was written from our list of benefits. And our list was compiled by the simple use of the SWAT? technique.

With practice, you'll very quickly learn to sharpen your sales message into an even more powerful and persuasive selling tool. Why not go over this piece of sales copy and see how much you really can improve it? Hone it even more and stamp your own personality into it. (But I'm still not paying you more than 50% of our fee from Janice!)

Next challenge? Apply the SWAT? technique to your own product or service and create your own sales message.

11. Well? Don't Just Sit There!

“The saddest words of tongue and pen are those ‘It might have been.’”
– John Greenleaf Whittier

Phew! You’ve finished MYWS!. It was a good “read,” wasn’t it? Have you ever read “The Tale Of Two Cities?” That’s a good read, too. But when you finish a novel like that, you either put it back on the bookshelf or you give it to a friend.

Let’s be honest. You didn’t buy Make Your Words SELL! for entertainment. You had a purpose. So when do you intend to put this invaluable knowledge into practice? Now? After your next cup of coffee is done? Maybe tomorrow? Or perhaps next week when you have more time?

Look, we’ve all been here before and the reality is that “leaving it ’til later” usually means... Never! You’re savvy enough to realize that the best and only time to start is right now. This minute. Pronto!

To make it easier for you to get into the swing of things, why not start by giving your present website a heavy dose of revitalizing tonic? Let’s do it...

11.1. The MYWS! Quick-Kick Start

You can immediately improve the selling power of your existing sales copy just by applying the MYWS! techniques outlined in Copywriting 101 and Copywriting 102.

Start with your home page and address the following questions. Then work through the rest of your site, one page at a time...

- Do you have a great USP-based opening headline?
- Is your page cluttered?
- Is it easy to read?
- Is your font user-friendly?
- Can it benefit by introducing more white space?
- Will your headlines be more dramatic by enclosing them in “quotes” and Capitalizing Most Words?
- Is the page background color too dark?
- Can you reduce the size of your paragraphs?
- Are there enough subheadings to help the flow? Do they make a mini-outline of your site?

- Can you get rid of any unnecessary graphics?
- Are your testimonials hidden away?
- Is your order page as persuasive as your sales message?

Work your way through every point and suggestion in Copywriting 101 and 102. Look at your site through the eyes of your visitor. If you allow your ego to influence your reactions, it will seriously damage your income. So be totally honest!

Better still, sit with a friend or colleague while she does it and ask her the questions. And be prepared for some painful answers.

Each small improvement may seem insignificant. But the accumulated effect of these seemingly minor changes will make a substantial improvement to your visitor's experience and to your profit!

Will it be hard work? No!

Quick? Yes!

Worthwhile? Definitely!

And what's the biggest bonus of all? It gets you started! And once these improvements are in place, you can begin the reappraisal of your whole site. Knowing you're better prepared this time, you can start from scratch and carry out a from-the-ground-up rewrite.

Want to do that right away? Perfect. Because you now have the rare opportunity to literally...

11.2. Transform Your Business

"But won't that mean some hard work?" Hard work, no. Time and effort? Yes.

Hey, I said at the beginning there's no such thing as a magic wand! Would you rather that I had promised you that within minutes of reading MYWS! you would be writing powerful killer copy that would have customers screaming to buy your products?

Yes well, you've heard all that before. We both know that it just doesn't happen like that! What will happen is that the relatively small amount of work you put into this now, will make a massive improvement to your bottom line. And I'm talking here about a permanent improvement.

That's not a wild promise... It's a fact!

Because the one thing that's not affected by the accelerating changes of the Internet is the irrefutable fact that words sell. Graphics don't sell. Bots don't sell. Search engines don't sell.

Banners don't sell and neither does tracking software, affiliate software or any other technology. Words sell!

Technology can automate your business and bring traffic to your door. And what would a successful business be without traffic?

Not successful, I guess.

But what happens when your visitors arrive? No software yet devised can actually talk to them and persuade them to buy! Only the right words, your words, can achieve that.

Prepare meticulously. Preparation is vital to the success of your Internet business. And 95% of website owners either don't know how to do it or can't be bothered. That's why they'll always remain small-time fishermen using the same bait, in the same large pond as all the others.

So I urge you to knuckle down and start from the very beginning. And here's where the effort comes in.

Why do I call it effort, for heaven's sake? Is a few hours spent reading a book and analyzing your business, competitors and customers really hard work? I hardly think so. Not when you consider the enormous rewards to be gained.

Perhaps you would rather spend even more effort trying out all the "magic pills" and "instant solutions" being offered in just about every newsletter ad you come across?

I thought not. Doesn't seem like such an effort at all when you look at it that way. Does it?

How do you start? The first thing to do is to decide to act now!

The biggest problem to overcome is procrastination! You can either promise yourself that you'll "get around to it" (which, in reality, means you never will). Or you can start now. And I mean right now! Start working on your website copy now, not tomorrow. See the dramatic difference you'll make to your business in just a few hours.

If you've studied the whole book, then go back to the SWAT? tutorial and watch the magic happen again before your very eyes!

Don't be tempted to take shortcuts. Take your time and really work at it. I promise you, it works. Then re-read the other chapters and tweak, adjust, and sharpen your copy into the dazzling diamond you deserve!

Successful copy is more than just knowing which words to use. It's about knowing how to SELL!

There's an unbelievable opportunity out there. You can reach an almost unlimited number of buyers. MYWS! shows you how to target your own "niche" market and identify the precise needs and wants of your specific "ideal" customer. Go ahead and grab those buyers right from under the noses of your competitors.

Hard work? Not when you're enjoying it so much. Not when you begin to see your website really begin to grow in stature. Not when you see how dramatically superior it becomes, compared to your competitors!

And I know from personal experience that work becomes a joy when the profits start rolling in! So leave the credit card fishing to the 95 percenters. Start immediately.

Use the awesome persuasive power of words... words that are being used right now by the Internet's top earning 5%, that elite group of savvy marketers who've learned how to use the incredible magic of words.

And to join them, all you have to do is... Make Your Words SELL!

For want of a nail, the shoe was lost. For want of a shoe, the horse was lost. For want of a horse, the rider was lost. For want of a rider, the battle was lost.
For want of a battle, the kingdom was lost. And all for the want of a horseshoe nail.

MYWS! will supply you with the nails. All you have to do is drive them home.

12. The 5 Copy Keys

“The shortest answer is doing.”
- George Herbert

Many people have asked me how I write such great copy for our SiteSell sites. Here are the five most important things that I keep firmly implanted in my brain while writing content for a site...

1) Become your customer.

This mindset virtually guarantees your success as a copywriter. As I mentioned earlier, it's so easy to forget to become your customer. Why? It's because we live inside our own skin.

Seriously, stick a yellow Post-It note to your monitor... “BECOME YOUR CUSTOMER!”

2) Benefits first.

Features are second to benefits. I've said it elsewhere, but I'll repeat it here...

- Features tell your visitor what the product is and what it does.
- Benefits answer what your visitor will get out of your product... What “pain” it cures, or what “gain” it delivers.

Seems clear, yet people mix up the two over and over again — heck, I do it all the time. The line is easy to blur.

This is less likely to happen if you can become your customer and really understand her needs and wants. Still, it's easy to confuse features and benefits. So...

The single best way to convert features into benefits is this technique of asking “So What?”

“SWAT?” it to death.

3) Remember the subtext.

“Text” is what the words say. “Subtext” is what's underneath, what's said “between the lines.” It's the hidden message. It's also what separates the scam artists from the real business people, because subtext is very hard to fake.

If you write shrill hype like all the scam artists do, it smells of “get rich quick.” Subtext can give away other situations as well.

Subtext is probably the single hardest part of copywriting to master. Even if you're pure of heart, the wrong subtext can hurt your effort. For example, if your copy tries too hard, the subtext says, "I'm desperate. Please, please buy my product."

4) K-I-S-S.

Write to a grade 7 level. Seriously. It's hard to read on the Web. Teachers teach us to write to impress, not to communicate. So instead of looking for that 8-syllable synonym for "blue," use easy, active, strong words.

Construct short sentences and short paragraphs.

Put space between paragraphs so your copy can breathe.

Bold or color important parts. Web surfers scan rather than read. Stop their eyes on the important parts.

Here's the bottom line... if you make your copy hard to read and scan, your visitor will not read it. If your visitor does not read your words, she will not buy your product.

5) Use the right tone.

Build a friendly, "across the table" tone. It's just you and your visitor having a conversation, seated together at a table.

Does that mean every site must have exactly the same tone? Not at all. Let's carry the analogy a little further...

Your web/graphic designer is like a carpenter. She builds the table and the room that holds the table. It might be a nice kitchen with a homey kitchen table, or it might be a high-powered granite conference table in a corporate boardroom. It all depends on whom you're planning to meet.

Is the salesperson going to use the same words to sell? Nope. Believe me, he'd use different words to sell in a kitchen compared to a boardroom. However, he must still talk to the people, not at them, in a friendly and conversational tone.

Use words at the educational level and for the personality type of your target audience.

OK, with those five important tools in your mental toolbox, and with this simple art of persuasion under your belt, you're ready to greet your customer at the front door of your website!

Wishing you much success,

Ken Evoy

SiteSell.com

13. Words That Trigger an Automatic Response

Words are the tools of the copywriter's trade. They are to a copywriter what a stethoscope is to a doctor. So think of this book as your very own doctor's bag of tools. Like a doctor, use them carefully. In the right hands, they can work magic.

Throughout our lives certain words and phrases are imprinted into our subconscious. The imprint becomes so irresistible that under certain conditions we automatically respond to those words. It's so powerful that we respond without a second thought. An uncontrollable and unconscious hair trigger forces us to automatically respond!

I refer to these words as Automatic Response Words.

Your name is a good example. It's the hottest Automatic Response Word on the planet... to you! Lying buried on a whole page of text, it magically jumps out at you as your eyes scan by. Yet to anyone else, your name is invisible.

For instance, if Tom sits in a football stadium amongst 60,000 other people and someone shouts "Jack," Tom won't even hear the name. It's just part of the background noise. But if someone shouts "Tom," he turns around, as if by remote control.

Why? Because the word "Tom" has been imprinted onto his subconscious. From a very early age, Tom's subconscious tells him that whenever his name is called, he should respond because there's something in it for him!

It's the same with certain other words. His brain has learned that he should take immediate notice of words like "urgent," "money," "free," and "how to." There's usually something in it for him if he responds!

And the advertising industry has proved time and time again that certain words are almost guaranteed to attract the attention of readers. That's why you'll tend to see the same words used by so many advertisers in their headlines and sales copy.

Advertisers use these specific words for one simple reason. The words work and they sell!

Fact. Intelligently selected Automatic Response Words in your headline or ad can dramatically increase your sales. Sprinkled sensibly throughout your sales message, they'll inject enthusiasm, emotion and motivation, and keep your reader glued to your copy.

Use these words to add strength and persuasiveness. Use them to grab and hold your reader's attention long enough for her to read the whole of your message.

Be cautious, though. Like candy and ice cream, it's possible to have too much of a good thing.

Carefully chosen Automatic Response Words can transform bland and uninteresting statements. Too many Automatic Response Words, on the other hand, reduce a potentially powerful message to background noise, at best. At worst, overusing these words will reduce your message to nauseating hype...

Now You Can Discover the Secrets to Guaranteed Fabulous Wealth With This Amazing Book by the Staggeringly Successful Internet Millionaire Joe Robson

So the trick is to get just the right balance. Just one word too many, and your message tips into oblivion!

These reference lists are by no means complete. We've organized these Automatic Response Words according to the occasion. Need just the right word to call your visitor to action and order? Pick the one that fits best from Call to Action.

Grow this little chapter and make it your own. First of all, print it out. Now whenever you come across a word that has injected power, persuasion, or emotion into a sales message, add it to the list.

You'll be amazed how many Automatic Response Words you'll collect. They'll help you compose killer headlines that will drive visitors to your order page like a magnet and skyrocket your sales into the stratosphere. And they're absolutely FREE!!!!!!

Sorry. Got carried away. Let's start our collection at the beginning, getting your visitor's Attention...

13.1. Attention Grabbers

OK, let's get "FREE" out of the way first. We're constantly being told that free is the best eyeball grabber in the world. Advertisers and direct marketers have used it successfully for decades.

The downside? On the Internet, FREE is grossly overused. This tremendously powerful attention-grabber is pushed into our faces wherever we travel on the Web...

FREE e-book. FREE download. FREE Bonus #17. FREE newsletter. FREE this, FREE that, FREE Willie, FREE Blind Mice, FREE everything!

Are Internet marketers that extraordinarily generous? Or do you smell a problem?

There's so much free stuff available on the Internet that we now believe that almost anything offered for free is not worth having. Because, for the most part, it's not!

Don't get me wrong. Free is still a powerful and persuasive motivator. But use it only when you feel that your free offer is original, believable and valuable.

One more point about grabbing attention...

Asking a question forces your visitor to think about the answer. This technique is a great attention-grabber. Assuming of course she's a targeted customer and the question intrigues, teases, provokes, recognizes pain, etc.

For example... "Fed Up With Email Overload?" This stops your visitor and makes her answer "YES!" You have aroused her curiosity — and you're implying that you have the cure for her pain.

Some of my favorite attention-grabbers...

You	Exhilarating	Why Should
Now	Astonishing	Why Put Up
At last	Staggering	How Can
Attention	Frustrated	Just Out
Urgent	Explosive	It's Time You
New	Amazing	How To Revolutionary
The Only	Risk-free	Family
Exclusive	Guaranteed	New Method
First	Stunning	Would You
Earn money	Did You Know	Are You
Sex	Have You	Don't You
Discover Secrets Of	How Many	Tired Of
Explore	Frustrated	Which Would
When You	Free	Love
If You	Which Would	Bargain
Experience	Are You	Announcing
The Don't Buy	Wouldn't You	Wanted
Reveal	Confused	Imagine
Do You Think	Will You	Latest
Learn	Could You	Important
When You	Do You Want	When Did
Startling	What Is	Introducing

13.2. Power-Boosters

Power-boosters add strength to any message. Like anything powerful, they're also potentially dangerous. Use too many and you'll be creating spam-type headlines and sales messages!

Use these words sparingly to create maximum effect...

Energetic	Staggering
Stunning	Masterful
Electrifying	Intense
Dynamic	Powerful
Potent	Overpowering
Vibrant	Compelling
Riveting	Unforgettable
Explode	Terrific
Remarkable	Sensational
Striking	Splendid
Incredible	Wonderful
Superb	Awesome
Breathtaking	Unbeatable
Magnificent	Unstoppable
Crucial	A Must Have
Vital	Indispensable
Essential	Critical
The Key to	Imperative

13.3. The Very Best

Your product or service has to be more than just the best in your market. It has to be perceived as the very best if you're to persuade your potential customer to buy it.

Her emotions are involved here. Not logic. She doesn't buy with logic. If she did, she would visit every single one of your competitors and draw up a list of comparisons.

She wants to feel that she's buying something special, something she won't find on every other website on the Internet. So go for maximal impact.

These Response Words will make you and your business stand out from the rest...

Legendary
Supreme Perfect
Unrivaled
The Top
Highest Ranking
Unbeatable
The Best
Distinguished Outstanding
Excellent
Unsurpassed
Highest Quality
Second To None
Outshines
Incomparable
Matchless
The Leading Undisputed
Number 1
Superb
Elite

First Class
The Foremost
Hard To Find Peerless
Rare
Distinctive
The Only Unusual
Ultimate Exceptional
Exclusive Unparalleled
Unique
Superior
Unrepeatable

13.4. Calls to Action

Next to your headline, your call to action is the most important part of your sales message. This is not for the faint-hearted! You can't afford to lose your nerve by watering it down to a modest request for an order.

Tell your potential customer exactly what to do. Show her exactly how to do it. And don't pussyfoot around!

The words below will help build up the sense of urgency, which is vital to your success. Keep the adrenaline flowing in her veins, so that she feels she must have your product — now!

Like everyone (you and me included), your prospect needs a little nudge to make up her mind. Just a nudge will do. We don't want to hit her over the head.

So use words that trigger the Automatic Response button in her subconscious and make her click that BUY NOW! button. Modesty at this point is guaranteed to lose you the order. Being nice at this stage may make you feel like a likeable person but you'll be a financially poor one.

These words will help you overcome your modesty. It's almost impossible to turn your call to action into dreaded hype.

Decide Now
Reserve Now
It's Up To You
You Be The Judge
Convinced?
Don't Delay
Don't Hesitate
Why wait?
Act Quickly
Don't Miss
Act Now
Decision Time

Don't Wait
It's Now Or Never
Now's The Time
Now Order
Now
Intrigued?
Decide For Yourself
Now
Limited Supply
Send Today
Say Yes
Immediately

Your product will improve your customer's lifestyle, won't it? It would be even better if it were to dramatically improve it!

Get results with these words...

Cuts Through Like Magic
Guaranteed to Drastically
Revitalizes
Delivers
Boosts
Improves
Proven
Profit Making
Sales Generating Works Wonders
Dramatically Terrific
Slices Through Unbelievably
Like Lightning
In One Fell Swoop
Instantaneously
Multiplies Profits
Works Instantly

13.6. Auto-Endorsers

You already know the extraordinary power of the testimonial. People tend to believe the endorsement of a third party. It appears to be unbiased so it must be true.

Sometimes a single, strategically placed Automatic Response Word can appear to endorse a message. It's the old "Imprint Syndrome" again. Our subconscious tells us that if we see "famous" in the written description of a product or service, it must be famous.

Start your list with these words...

Successful
Renowned Talked About
First Choice
Famous
Recommended By
In Demand

Chosen By Widely Advertised
Authentic
Endorsed By
THE (book) Recognized As The Leading Trend Setter Web Wide
Universally Accepted
10,000 Delighted Users

13.7. Arousers

If you're writing a "soft sell" or emotive sales message, these words will set the scene in your reader's imagination. They'll conjure up relaxing visions of her lifestyle once she owns your life-changing product (e.g., an exotic holiday, new clothes, a romantic restaurant dinner, jewelry).

Don't overdo it, though, or else your message will become slushy. Ugh!

Tranquil
Mouthwatering
Incandescent
Radiant
Attractive
Handsome
Delicious Brilliant
Warm
Sleek
Pretty Romantic
Burning
Passionate Evocative
Haunting
Captivating
Imagine
Fashionable

Mystical Graceful
Hot
Tantalizing
Appealing
Elegant
Sensuous
Sparkling
Glowing Dazzling
Stunning
Gorgeous
Enchanting
Magical
Lavish
Breathless
Dreamlike
Satisfying
Distinctive Modern
Up to Date

13.8. Reassurers

Throughout MYWS!, I have constantly pushed home the crucial need to reassure your customer (both before and after the sale). Reassure, reassure and then reassure her even more that her decision to buy is the right one.

Use the words below in your call to action, order form, order confirmation web page, and in your autoresponder thank you message.

Your customer believes she's making a wise choice, otherwise she wouldn't buy from you.

However, she still needs someone to reassure her that it's the best decision!

You're Protected
Dependable
Risk
Protects You
Safe
Fully Protected
Total Security

Rely On Rest Easy
Peace of Mind
No Problem
Safe
Problem-Free
You Won't Be Disappointed

13.9. Joints

You already know the importance of using white space between your short chunks of text. You also know how important it is to maintain the flow of information.

A smooth seamless joint between the various parts of your sales message is essential.

After a while, though, the use of and, but, or also can become boring and predictable. So how do you prevent your copy from becoming lumpy and unconnected? Sprinkle in "link" words, helped by the occasional ellipsis (3 dots)...

What's more...

The result

The fact is

That's why

Even better

In short...

In brief...

So don't forget...

So remember...

Best of all...

Here's why...

How will you benefit?

What does this mean for you?

And we don't stop there...

Most importantly...

Fair enough?

Agreed?

Like this...

How?

Let's try it...

Let's do it....

There you have it...

One thing's for sure...

Here's how...

And that's not all...

Now there's a better way...

Even better news...

Just look at this...

13.10. Freebies

Yep, it's that four-letter word again...

Absolutely free
Yours free
Free of charge
Free gift
Free trial
Free download
Free bonus
Valuable free gift

If free is in danger of turning your message into hype, change tack a little and use something different but the same ...

(A $37 Value)
At No Extra Cost
Yours to Keep
Early Bird Bonus
We're Giving Away
It's on Us
No Like -- No Buy!
Try It Out for Nothing
Accept This 30-Day No-Risk Trial

13.11. Guarantees

The guarantee must leave a “guaranteed” impression in your visitor’s mind. Simply stating “Guaranteed for 30 Days” is useless. Like everything else in your sales message, you must make every benefit, every feature, and every word SELL!

And that brings us back to the old chestnut... reassurance, reassurance, and more reassurance. Give your guarantee punch! Give it impact! Make it reinforce your credibility!

But don't write, “We always honor our guarantee.” That means you're accustomed to refund requests! It's better to write something like... “But something that's great for someone else may not be exactly right for you. So if...”

Every time you visit a website, read the guarantee. Whenever you come across a guarantee that impresses you, make a note of it and add it to your list.

Bottom line? Write a guarantee that SELLS!

For example...

“If, for any reason whatsoever, you’re not completely satisfied, simply let us know within 30 days and you’ll receive a full and total refund. Absolutely no questions asked.”

Here’s a list of tried and proven response words that will get you started...

Lifetime Guarantee
Full Refund
Satisfaction Guaranteed
Totally Risk Free
Nothing to Lose
No Questions Asked
Refund Immediately
Prompt Refund
Ironclad Guarantee
It’s Our Risk
Can We Be Fairer?
No-Risk Guarantee
If You Don’t Love It, Don’t Pay
Just Ask for Your Money Back
No Quibble Guarantee
My Personal Guarantee
FULL 12 months
Money Back If Not Delighted
Try It for 30 Days FREE
For Your Total Peace of Mind

13.12. Copywriting Reference Library

Whenever I sit down to write copy, I surround myself with 24 loyal assistants. They’re brilliant, always ready with a good idea or just the right “turn of phrase” to use.

How do I afford these assistants? Easy, they’re books!

Note: Not all of these books are still in print. You may have to go to an out-of-print or used bookstore on the Web to hunt them down. They’re worth your time and effort. I guarantee it.

1) Let's start with these excellent resources...

Words that Sell

Author/Editor: Richard Bayan
Publisher: Contemporary Books
ISBN 0-8092-4799-2

More Words that Sell

Author/Editor: Richard Bayan
Publisher: McGraw Hill
ISBN 0-07-141853-9

Phrases that Sell

Author/Editor: Edward Werz and Sally Germain
Publisher: Contemporary Books
ISBN 0-8092-2977-3

Cybertalk that Sells

Author/Editor: Herschell Gordon Lewis and Jamie Murphy
Publisher: Contemporary Books
ISBN 0-8092-2923-4

2) Analogies, metaphors, and similes all spark copy with originality. Use them to make a connection with your reader.

The Analogy Book of Related Words: Your Secret Shortcut to Power Writing

Author/Editor: Selma Glasser
Publisher: Communication Creativity
ISBN 0-918880-23-8

Metaphors Dictionary

Author/Editor: Elyse Sommer with Dorrie Weiss
Publisher: Visible Ink Press
ISBN 0-7876-0619-7

Similes Dictionary

Author/Editor: Elyse Sommer and Mike Sommer
Publisher: Gale Research Company
ISBN 0-8103-4361-4

Falsier than a Weeping Crocodile and Other Similes

Author/Editor: Elyse Sommer and Mike Sommer
Publisher: Visible Ink Press
ISBN 0-8103-9414-6

Picturesque Expressions:

A Thematic Dictionary

Author/Editor: Laurence Urdang, Walter W. Hunsinger and Nancy LaRoche.

Publisher: Gale Research Company

ISBN 0-8103-1606-4

3) Need a proverb to spice up a topic? Proverbs add creativity and snap to your copy.

The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs

Author/Editor: John Simpson

Publisher: Oxford University

Press ISBN 0-19-281880-5

The Penguin Dictionary of Proverbs

Author/Editor: Rosalind Fergusson

Publisher: The Penguin Group

ISBN 1 85471 095 8

4) Rhymes add punch to product names and headlines.

The Penguin Rhyming Dictionary

Author/Editor: Rosalind Fergusson

Publisher: Penguin Books

ISBN 0-14-051136-9

Capricorn Rhyming Dictionary Author/

Editor: Bessie G. Redfield Publisher:

The Putnam Publishing Group ISBN

0-399-51272-1

The Complete Rhyming Dictionary

Author/Editor: Clement Wood

Publisher: Doubleday & Company, Inc.

ISBN 0-385-00046-4

Whitfield's University Rhyming Dictionary

Author/Editor: Jane Shaw Whitfield and Frances Stillman

Publisher: Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc.

ISBN 0-06-463538-4

5) Quotes give you a flexible tool. Use them for humor, to build credibility and to add a certain "presence."

20,000 Quips and Quotes

Author/Editor: Evan Esar

Publisher: Doubleday & Company Inc.

ISBN 0-385-00047-2

*Great Business Quotations:
From those who should know and a few who shouldn't!*
Author/Editor: Jim Fisk and Robert Barron
Publisher: Futura Publications
ISBN 0 7088 3162 1

Peter's Quotations: Ideas For Our Time
Author/Editor: Dr. Laurence J. Peter
Publisher: Bantam Books
ISBN 0-553-14307-7

1,911 Best Things Anybody Ever Said
Author/Editor: Robert Byrne
Publisher: Ballantine Books
ISBN 0-449-90285-4

*The Forbes Book of Business Quotations
14,173 Thoughts on the Business of Life*
Author/Editor: Ted Goodman
Publisher: Black Dog & Leventhal Publishers, Inc.
ISBN 1-884822-62-7

The Columbia Dictionary of Quotations
Author/Editor: Robert Andrews
Publisher: Columbia University Press
ISBN 0-231-07194-9

6) Use an encyclopedia to make sure that you've got your facts straight.

Chambers Biographical Dictionary Author/Editor: Magnus Magnusson Publisher:
Chambers Harrap Publishers Ltd. ISBN 0-550-16040 X Hardback
0-550-16041 8 Paperback

The Concise Columbia Encyclopedia
Author/Editor: Judith S. Levey and Agnes Greenhall
Publisher: Avon Books
ISBN 0-380-63396-5

7) Whoops! Didn't think that I'd forget a Thesaurus, did you?

The Synonym Finder Author/
Editor: J.I. Rodale Publisher:
Rodale Press, Inc. ISBN
0-87857-236-8

Surprised I don't use any online services? Can't be bothered. I once spent two hours looking for the date of birth and death of Malcolm Forbes. Then I remembered my biographical encyclopedia.

In my opinion, some things still are faster on paper. Not many, but some.

13.13. Choose Carefully and Sprinkle Lightly

Remember...

Add just a sprinkling, no more, of carefully chosen words to add punch to your copy. If you overdo it, you'll cross the line into husker or spam territory.

So here's to your success, automatically!

SiteSell Inc. ("SiteSell") has differentiated proprietary trademarks from descriptive terms in the book by following the distinctive writing style used by the manufacturer and/or the trademark holder.

All product names and/or logos are copyrights and trademarks of their respective owners. None of these owners has authorized, sponsored, endorsed, or approved this publication. SiteSell has not received any remuneration in return for including any company or product in this book.

The authors and publisher, SiteSell Inc., have made their best effort to produce a high quality, informative and helpful book. But they make no representation or warranties of any kind with regard to the completeness or accuracy of the contents of the book. They accept no liability of any kind for any losses or damages caused or alleged to be caused, directly or indirectly, from using the information contained in this book.

Screenshots in this book are directly from publicly accessible file archives. They are used as "fair use" under 17 U.S.C. Section 107 for news reportage purposes only, to illustrate various points that are made in the book. Text and images available over the Internet may be subject to copyright and other intellectual rights owned by third parties. Some images copyright www.arttoday.com.

Make Your Words Sell!
© 2000-2023 SiteSell Inc.
All rights reserved worldwide.
First Edition 2000. ISBN 0-9684292-4-6

No part of this publication may be stored in a retrieval system, transmitted, or reproduced in any way, including but not limited to digital copying and printing without the prior agreement and written permission of the publisher.

SiteSell Inc.
1000 Saint Jean Boulevard, Suite 702
Pointe-Claire, QC, Canada
H9R 5P1